
Marlene's newly alluring in "The Garden of Allah"—and simply breathtaking here!

"Why are you so unhappy?" one of her visitors asked ~~her~~. "You, ~~Marlene Dietrich, who have everything~~. . . ."

Her eyes came back and rested on the speaker. A moment of silence. Then, unsmiling:

"I had everything," she whispered, and her eyes went away again.

A LITTLE while later, a man who works with her told me: "She speaks of him often—of Jack. She calls him 'the great friend.' You see how different she is now from what she used to be. That change in her dates back to Jack's passing."

"You think that was what caused it?" I asked.

The fellow, a philosopher of sorts albeit he phrased his ideas in the back-lot language of Hollywood, figured it out this way:

"Well, look. Take Marlene and how she came to Hollywood. First thing she saw here was the town plastered with 24-sheets, with her name in letters taller than two of herself. She was treated as a queen, an empress. Everything was done for her. She merely had to snap her fingers, and what she wanted was supplied. She got a tremendous salary—as much as $250,000 for a picture, I understand. Her every whim was law. It's pretty hard for any human being to stand up under that sort of thing without believing herself the big shot of big shots. I can understand, having been in Hollywood, what happened to Dietrich and why she became the 'great one' she was.

"And then Jack Gilbert came into her life. It was something far finer, take it from me, than an ordinary flirtation, or even an affair. It transcended these. Marlene's got a husband, you know, and she loves him. But in Jack, she found a friend for her soul. I think Jack must have told her much of his life—it was tough, you know. He knew poverty and deprivation. Jack was loved in Hollywood, because he loved people. He wasn't high-hat or snooty. Dietrich learned things from him. She began to see herself and others in a different light.

ON THE SET WITH Romeo AND Juliet

A tender, romantic moment between Norma Shearer, as Juliet, and Leslie Howard, as Romeo.

Our scribe plays extra to give you inside highlights of a really important picture

DON'T PICK your teeth with a knife," admonished Leslie Howard seriously, startling Norma Shearer to the point where she nearly fell off her chair. Then she noticed that he was reading from a very old book of etiquette, which the research department had unearthed in studying the customs and manners of the 15th Century for the screen production of "Romeo and Juliet."

"I didn't know they had an Emily Post in those days," Mr. Howard remarked.

"Certainly, they had an Emily Post," Miss Shearer replied, "only Emily was no lady; she was a gentleman!"

"So I see. In fact, she was two gentlemen," chuckled Mr. Howard, as he read further and noted that one authority on good manners of that day was Friar Bonvesino da Riva and another was Francesco da Barberino.

Romeo and Juliet had just made the famous parting scene in Juliet's bedroom and Norma, looking startlingly beautiful as Juliet, had sat down to rest a moment while Leslie Howard, as Romeo, amused himself and the others by reading aloud.

"Hold your food in three clean fingers," he continued.

"If you offer the cup, don't put your thumb on the upper edge.

"Don't put your knife back in its sheath too early—there may be more to come.

"It is sometimes better not to seat relatives together at a banquet."

"Proving that relatives were relatives, even in the 15th Century," laughed Norma. Then in a more serious tone, she wondered what was holding them up and learned that the grass had grown so high outside her balcony, since they had taken the last scene there a few days before, that it must be cut before they could proceed with the scene. A lawn-mower had been sent for!

IN ORDER to see what was going on (no visitors being allowed), I wangled myself a day's extra work on the "Romeo and Juliet" set. I was placed on call but not on salary and allowed to hang around for days awaiting my big moment. I made the most of those days and got myself generally regarded as a nuisance, but I saw Norma Shearer and Leslie Howard as Juliet and Romeo; John Barrymore (without Ariel) as Mercutio, Basil Rathbone as Tybault, Reginald Denny as Benvolio, Edna May Oliver as Juliet's nurse and all the rest of them making "Romeo and Juliet."

When Norma worked she was surrounded by such exclusiveness that often the big doors to the sound stages were locked before Romeo could get inside. Property men and assistants were banished to the far distant corners when the tenderly beautiful scenes were made in Juliet's bedroom and on the balcony. (Don't ask where I was, but the spread on Juliet's little canopied bed hung to the floor!)

Certainly no expense was spared to make the courtyard and balcony set the loveliest ever seen. I have no words to describe its delicate beauty.

The balcony was in one

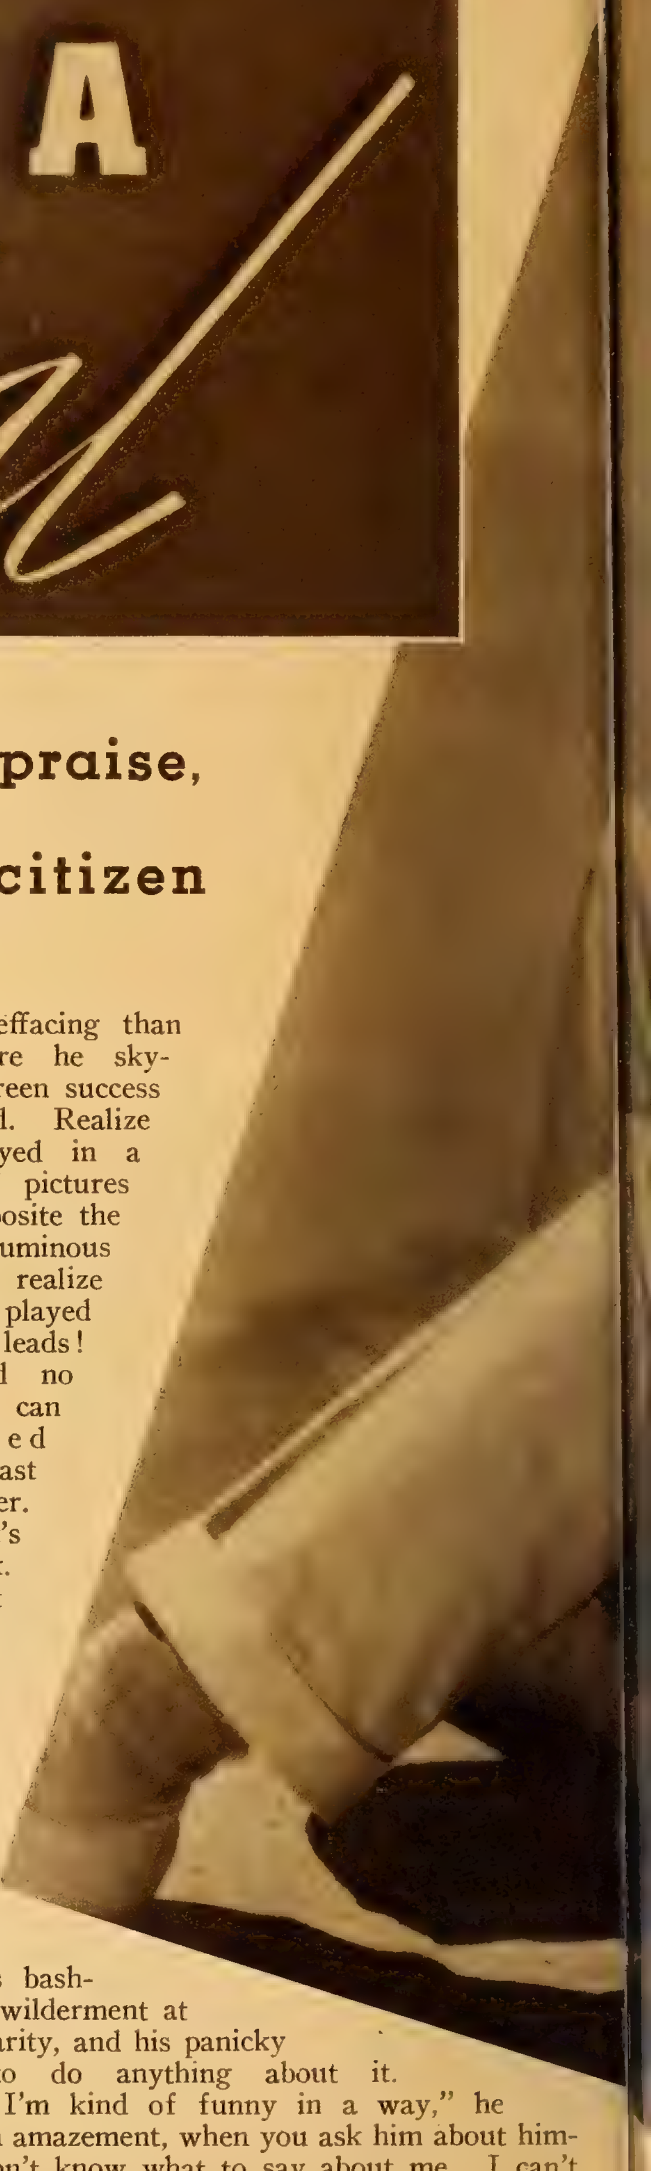
Fred MacMurray, suspicious of praise, is Hollywood's most bashful citizen



THAT BIG new Kress' "five-an'-ten" on Hollywood Boulevard was crowded, as usual. Nobody was paying any particular attention to the tall chap shopping with two ladies, at the notion counter.

Nobody, that is, except a little girl with spindly legs and carrot-colored hair. Funny, isn't it, how kid's'll notice things their elders don't? Anyway, this little girl stared for a big-eyed moment at the young man. Then, in one of those squeaky voices that carry above any ordinary din, she squealed:

"Ooooohh! I know YOU! You're FRED MacMURRAY!!"

Instantly, the store was quiet. But that lasted only a startled second. Then it was noisier than ever, as women from every corner of the place flocked to where the little girl was jabbering at the red-faced young man. Even clerks behind the counters dropped everything to see Fred MacMurray in person.

Fred stammered awkwardly. The little girl was demanding to know whether or not he really and honest fell out of bed in "Hands Across the Table." Fred gulped and stared in terror at the avalanche of femininity descending upon him. Then, still gulping, he turned and fled—ran pell-mell for the big front doors, dashed red-faced across the sidewalk and up the street. Into a nondescript little roadster parked by the curb he popped, started the engine and sped away.

Behind him, besides the crowd of disappointed women, he had left the two women he'd been shopping with—his mother and the long-time gal-friend, whom he has recently married, Lillian Lamont, former model. They had to finish their shopping and find their way home as best they could; the crowds had Fred licked.

They knew, as do all his intimates, that Fred MacMurray is one of the most bashful men in Hollywood. They know, too, as do those who work with him, that he's one leading man without a swelled head. Fame has left Fred MacMurray, if anything at all, just a little bit more shy and self-effacing than he was before he sky-rocketed to screen success in Hollywood. Realize that he's played in a whole row of pictures in a year, opposite the screen's most luminous beauties—and realize that he's never played anything but leads! It's a record no other star can boast. Fred doesn't boast about it, either. He thinks it's just good luck.

That incident in the "five-an'-ten" is as typical of Fred as any anecdote one could tell. It shows his dominant traits so effectively—his bashfulness, his bewilderment at his own popularity, and his panicky helplessness to do anything about it.

"I suppose I'm kind of funny in a way," he grins, in boyish amazement, when you ask him about himself, "but I don't know what to say about me. I can't analyze my feelings. The only way (Continued on page 84)

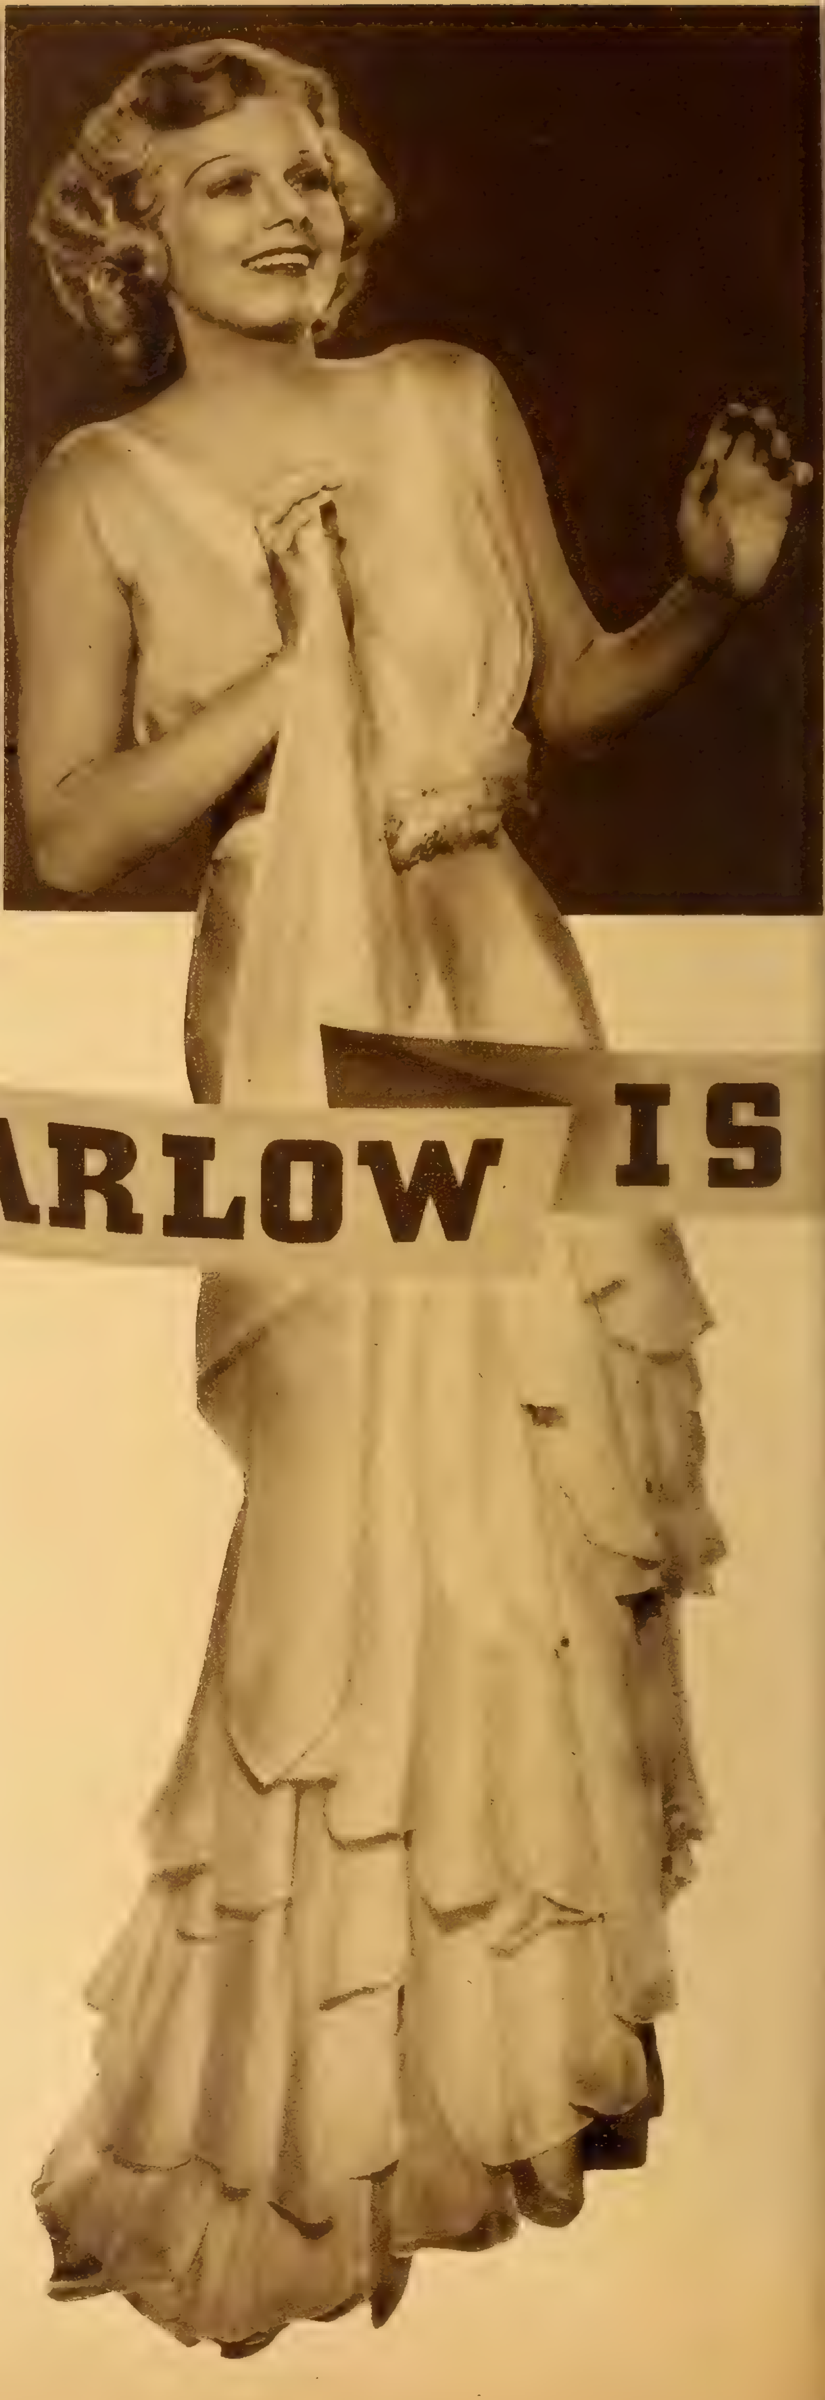
The most publicized star in Hollywood has made an abrupt "about face." Why?

She's changed the color of her life, as well as the color of her hair. Jean's a different gal.



JEAN HARLOW IS

By Faith Service

HOLLYWOOD is saying, "Jean Harlow has changed." She has—in many ways. She has moved from her palatial mansion, replete with swimming pool, landscaped gardens and white salon to a cosy, charming house on a quiet street such as any nice, successful girl might be expected to live in.

She has changed her hair from the famed, sensational platinum blonde to a soft and lovely brownette—a conservative color. She is more subdued. She is more serious. There are those who say she looks a little sad. Others say she looks peaceful. There is something different about her, anyway Why?

What is it all about? What has caused the change?

"What has happened to Harlow?" asks Hollywood.

I found out.

I SPENT the afternoon with Jean in her new home. We had coffee in the garden—a moderate-sized, enclosed garden with simple wicker furniture and folksy flowers. The house is cosy, charming. It is not the great, white, shining house which Jean built on a high hill near Belle Air. That is sold, furniture and all. A few prized possessions were kept by Jean for sentiment's sake. Everything else went. And now Jean and her mother, their faithful colored couple and their three high-bred cats, live in a homey place on a neighborly street here in Beverly Hills.

And Jean said to me, and looked what she said, "I feel more at home here than I ever did in the big place. I love it. And so does mother. We haven't that terrific responsibility. We loved the other house because we—and especially mother—had put so much into it. But it was too large a house for two women alone. We rattled about in it, hollowly. We had eaten about two meals in the dining-room in the past two years. We always ate on trays. We never entertained more than two or three people at a time. And I used to say to mother that it seemed ridiculous and a sort of a shame for us to be living in that big place so much to ourselves when people, who do give parties and could use the pool and the drawing-room, really would get pleasure out of it. . . ."

"But why didn't you?" I asked, curious that a lovely blonde girl in a luxurious white house didn't entertain, didn't give parties. "Why didn't you entertain a lot and have big parties? You always seem to like people, Jean. I should think you would have got a kick out of all that."

"I do like people," Jean told me, earnestly, "I like them very much—one, two or three at a time. I'm interested in them and I like to talk to them, but—it may sound odd but you'll have to believe me—I'm shy with people I don't know. I don't know what to do. And so I always do one of two things—either talk my head off about nothing or retreat into a corner and say nothing. Both are extreme reactions—and both are over-reactions."

"And both," I supplied, "indicate the shy person's attempt to compensate."

"Anyway," said Jean, "here we can have our two or three friends, people I know well and we're happy."

JEAN'S MOTHER "did over" most of the interior of the house when she rented it. She reupholstered a great deal of the furniture. She had the dark walls and ceilings painted white. Two divans in the living-room were re-covered in a beige rep. Jean pointing them out to me said, "The material cost sixty cents a yard."

As we sat in the garden, some silk undies and socks and things were flapping in the breeze on the sun-deck above. Jean said, "The cats got all tangled up in the clothes lines when they were down here in the back yard. We didn't know what to do with the wash so I had the lines put up there."

She told me about other changes they had made in the house. The powder room was converted into the cook's room—drapes were changed from ornate Spanish velours to simple chintzes—the breakfast room was given over to the butler with screens placed so that his room won't "show" from the dining-room.

And as she described the changes in the house, with amusement and some pride, I knew that they were the outward and visible tokens of the inward and less apparent changes in Jean herself.

I felt a sense of incredulous amazement that this quiet capable girl, competently and economically "making things do" could be the same as the sumptuous, platinum blonde girl in the great house on the hill.

I had the feeling that the Jean the fans think they know and the Jean her friends know were gradually drawing nearer together and

The GLOOM-CHASER

By Helen Fay Ludlam

HENRY ARMETTA is a born comedian. Not one of the high-powered funnymen of Hollywood, those whose fortunes have climbed into the millions, have the power of this little man over their audiences. Laurel and Hardy, Harold Lloyd, even Chaplin, the immortal one, must have gags and "sequences" and gadgets to put their humor across but Henry—just let his face be seen on the screen and the audience howls with laughter.

He doesn't have to do a thing, but he steals practically every scene he is in. Regardless of the action the audience keeps on chuckling, holding in the big laugh with difficulty until Henry perhaps lifts an eyebrow—then the house, unable to hold in any longer, fairly rocks with laughter. I've heard it more times than I can count. He is the one hundred percent gloom-proof actor on the screen today.

Henry's career is somewhat remarkable. You have read about him before and know his biographical data, as we call it, so I won't go into that. As a matter of fact I don't know it, but years ago, when I was doing publicity for William Farnum, Henry was Bill's valet. Henry preceded me in the Farnum menage so I don't know how Bill happened to find him, but as he himself has said, in several interviews, he was valet first to Raymond Hitchcock. Hitchy and Bill were friends, so that is probably how the connection was made.

If it was, I don't know that Hitchy did his friend Bill a very good turn. A man's valet is usually expected to keep both his own and his master's head under moments of stress and in this case it was just the other way around. Henry would lose his completely, and Bill would have to handle him as though he were a child. As an example, Mr. Farnum, who is a fine golfer, was to play in a tournament in Philadelphia one Sunday. The night before he cautioned Henry to be not a minute later than seven the next morning as he had to make the nine o'clock train to the City of Brotherly Love.

TWO CAREER GAL

By James Reid

Joan is appearing in "Two in a Crowd."

The littlest Bennett's energy is simply colossal!

The Markeys—Diana, Joan, Gene and Melinda.

TWO YEARS ago, a touching story about Joan Bennett found its way into print. A poignant story about a beautiful girl, a talented actress, who was partially blind, but completely courageous.

It "revealed" that Joan Bennett lived in a world of haze. She saw faces in a blur at a distance of more than arm's-length. She was constantly ignoring old friends on the street because—she could not see them. When she played a movie scene, she could not distinguish her fellow-players except in close-ups. She had had to forego tennis, one of her favorite sports, because she could not see the balls coming toward her on the court. She could read little, lest she strain her already weakened eyes. She was in constant danger of becoming completely blind and she wore dark glasses to hide her tragic secret.

The story circled the world. A deluge of sympathy descended upon Joan. In its poignance, the story was haunting, unforgettable. It had one flaw: it wasn't true.

I reminded Joan of the story the other day. She had just returned from Palm Springs, one of the world's sunniest spots, where she had gone between pictures for a rest and a satisfying session of reading. Sun-tinted, rested, with her blonde hair newly darkened, she was completely refreshing in a smartly tailored suit of dark blue and gray herringbone. She wore sun-glasses, which are ever-present with half of Hollywood. The sharp sunlight demands them. But—those sun-glasses did not prevent her seeing, and greeting with a smile, Producer Walter Wanger—half of the length of the restaurant away—before she spoke.

"Oh, that story!" Joan said, in a tone that hinted at too keen a remembrance. "It's still pursuing me. According to the story, you know, I was about to go blind any day."

Why hadn't she denied the story when it appeared—?

"I wanted to. I was upset about it—and mad about it. But friends told me that people (Continued on page 71)

Bing Crosby's three boys won't be "movie" kids if their Pa and Ma have their way

Bing, as you will see him in his new opus, "Rhythm on the Range."

By Caroline Somers Hoyt

SHRIEKS OF laughter were coming from the direction of the nursery as the butler knocked with as much reluctance as interrupting a directors' meeting would command. Cautiously he opened the door a crack.

"Your brother is here with a man to see you, Mr. Crosby," he announced. "He says it's important."

Bing never lifted his eyes from the block house he was building on the floor. "Tell him to see me at my office tomorrow," he said. "I'm busy."

Presently there was another knock on the nursery door and without waiting for an invitation, Bing's brother, Everett, burst into the room.

"Bing, this is important!" he exploded. "You know I wouldn't have bothered you tonight if it weren't. There's a fellow downstairs with a song that's a knockout. He wants to give you first crack at it. It'll take you just a minute to hear it."

"Can't you see I'm busy?" asked Bing soberly. "Tell him to bring it over to the studio tomorrow."

"But he won't wait," Everett insisted. "He's going to submit it to Vallee. I'm telling you, Bing, it's hot."

"No," Bing insisted with a finality that discouraged further argument. "This is important. You know," he continued earnestly, "it's an art to build these houses high enough so they'll make a loud crash when they're knocked down."

To a singer, with a big weekly radio program, getting new songs is an all-important problem. There are so few real song hits and so many singers trying to get them first. But to Bing Crosby his children are more important than anything else. The thing that worries him more than getting a good song is to find more time to spend with his children.

So much has been written about Hollywood parents—about the fantastic way their children are reared; about the extravagant parties given on birthdays and other holidays; about the elaborate nurseries, play houses, the nurses and bodyguards, that it is only fair, I believe, to present the other side of the case.

It has been my observation that, for the most part, the children of the stars are more sensibly brought up than the average child of wealthy parents. The Bing Crosbys are a fair example of normal, sensible parents in Hollywood or any place else in the world.

Bing is a wealthy man. He could lavish every luxury on his children, if he wished, but he doesn't. He is preparing them for the future and believes the best way to do that is to give them a healthy, happy, normal childhood. He admits he bought his big ranch between Hollywood and San Diego, at Santa Fe Springs, partly to indulge himself in his hobby of breeding race horses, but more as a perfect place to raise his family. True, he is building a new home in town that resembles a young hotel, but when Bing isn't working, the Crosbys call the ranch "home."

"Hollywood is of necessity an artificial place in which to live," Bing said. "Children can't help but get false ideas of the value of the real things of life. On the ranch they will grow up with the benefits of country life. They play outdoors all day and are as brown as nuts the year around. They have dogs and horses for companions and you can't beat that. They will learn to swim and ride and play tennis before they even go to school."

In the years to come the children will carry on the Crosby name—and perhaps the Crosby fame—and he wants them to be physically and morally fit to be prepared for life as he knows it.

ONE RECALLS that after Bing graduated from college he worked for a while before he decided to take up the study of law. Then he went to law school at night for two years while he worked day times to pay his way. He knows the value of money despite his apparent carefree attitude toward its disposition and behind that bland, kidding manner a very efficient set of brains has planned his sons' futures.

Bing has knocked around. He knows what life is all about. Before he was married he became, according to his intimates, one of Hollywood's champion doorstep sitters. When he arrived home very late at night he would sit on the doorstep all night rather than waken the family. When he married Dixie he not only had to abandon doorstep sitting as a midnight pastime, but poker games and little romantic excursions. But when one of his erstwhile pals suggested that he was giving up romance to be an "old married man," Bing replied:

"I'm not giving up romance. I'm taking it home with me."

And he urged Dixie, who had a Fox contract, to give up her motion picture work. "I'm working," he told her. "Your career from now on will be acting as Mrs. Bing Crosby."

He knew what he wanted then. He knows what he wants for his children now. He intends to do everything to see that they get a chance in life, but he is determined not to make it too easy for them.

It is considered quite natural in the ordinary wealthy home for the entire care of the children to be turned over to nurses and governesses, but the three Crosby children are looked after and cared for by one nurse and Dixie, their youthful mother. There is no occasion for the children to make a brief daily appearance before their parents to be kissed goodnight, because usually their mother prepares them for bed, and if Bing is not working he, too, is always with them.

"Bing's lucky to be married to Dixie," one of their friends remarked to me recently. "Most girls in her position would be out spending his money. She's never out playing bridge or kicking around. You can always find her at home with her children."

Of course all parents love their children, but those Crosbys are enthusiastic about (Continued on page 79)

The Bing Crosbys bought a ranch so the boys could have an outdoor childhood. Dixie with the twins, Dennis and Philip, and big brother, Gary.

Little Orphan Annie

Dixie Lee Crosby can have a career or leave it—the big thing is her boys. Hollywood thinks Bing is lucky to have married such a swell home gal.

No one could wish to be slimmer than Marlene Dietrich. Evidently, having a child hasn't had any evil effects on her figure.

"Eating out" hasn't made Joan Bennett forget that she must conform to her diet rules, as many of you claim it has done.

Arline Judge, another young screen mother, knows how utterly ridiculous it is to wail, "But I've had a child. That's why I'm fat."

Debunking all the "I can't reduce" excuses ever given

WHAT IS IT that gets you out of trouble in a court of law, but into a heap of trouble in the home—and with me, as well? You don't even have to turn to the back of the book for the answer, because I'm going to give it to you here and now: an alibi. What a pernicious little five-letter word it is! Add an "s" to it, and that's where the trouble begins because, when you start the alibis, they multiply like guinea pigs. Every time you turn around there's another litter! Soon it's ali-bye-bye to your figure and your face, and sometimes the man of your dreams, too. You think I'm just an exaggerator, a maker of mountains out of molehills, a regular Calamity Jane? I am not. Listen!

I have here ten of the flimsiest little excuses on record. One by one I shall list them, prove them to be phoney, mess them up in general so they won't be one darn bit of good to you, and then I'll tell you, my darlings, what to do if you have fallen under their spell. So, hang on, children, here we go on the alibi merry-go-round!

Alibi number one, and it's a honey: "At my age, it's natural to be fat."

This is the pet alibi of women who have passed the forty line. It makes me so mad, I almost burst a seam every time I hear it. It is not "natural" to be fat at any age. I'm fifty-five, myself, four feet ten inches high and weigh ninety-eight pounds.

Just because you've been on earth for forty years doesn't mean you have to carry around an extra forty pounds of ballast for the rest of your lives.

You clean your house every day to get rid of accumulated dirt, don't you? You'd be knee-deep in it if you didn't. Would you say it was "natural" for any woman to allow her house to become cluttered up with debris? Of course not! You'd call her a sloppy Annie and a lazy so-and-so. Well, it makes just about as much sense to say it's natural for your bodies to be cluttered

Anne Shirley's mother may be inclined toward stoutness, but Anne keeps slim.

ARE YOU AMONG THOSE WHO CLAIM THAT—

2. I haven't time to exercise. I work all day.
3. I can't diet when I eat out.

5. Never mind, darling, you'll outgrow it.
6. I can't watch my diet. I cook for the family.
7. I've tried everything on the market to reduce.

up with a lot of fat bumps and bulges, at any age.

You'll find plenty of your favorite movie stars "crowding forty" (or skipping it), who are still slim. Look at Billie Burke. And you may have heard of a gal named Irene Rich; don't see how you could miss it, for her slimness at forty has been publicized to the hilt. And that's okay, for slim she is. Being a shrinking violet, I must tell you that mama did it. Like George Washington, I cannot tell a lie, but unlike Georgie I didn't do it with my hatchet. I worked over Irene, made her slim and lovely and taught her how she could keep herself that way, and I'm that proud of a photograph Irene autographed to me: "To Sylvia, from one of us whom she makes look like we want to look. Always the best of luck to you."

Now don't sit there muttering that money, leisure and artful clothes are the answer to the forty-year-old-figure problem. On the contrary, the (Continued on page 69)

This is Michael Whalen, with whom you're destined to become well acquainted.

Mike Whalen and Jean Muir in a romantic moment from "White Fang."

By William F. French

WITHIN A few months everyone will be talking of the phenomenal luck that skyrocketed this young six-feet-twoer to fame and fortune in less than half a year —Michael Whalen, star of "White Fang."

Aladdin's lamp has been rubbed for other young men in Hollywood; such as Robert Taylor, Fred MacMurray, Henry Fonda, Errol Flynn and Nelson Eddy. But never before in such a "cat-with-a-mouse" manner, for Lady Luck surely fitted Mike with a crown of thorns before applying the coveted garland of success.

Tested and rejected by practically every major studio, Michael Whalen was the universal football of the casting offices for eighteen months before getting a chance to prove that he has more of what it takes than any "find" in years.

TODAY, with only five months' picture experience under his belt, he is regarded by Darryl Zanuck as the most promising newcomer in films, and sufficiently strong to carry on without the help of other stars. So, instead of going the rounds as the handsome he-man romantic lead to the various favorite ladies of the films (and if you've seen him in "Professional Soldier," "The Song and Dance Man," "The Country Doctor" or "The Poor Little Rich Girl," you know he has the looks the women stars love to play to), he is standing on his own feet, with top billing in "White Fang."

Now as to Michael Whalen's Hollywood "break." He got it at Paramount when, in his

Fay Wray is as enigmatic as her famous prototype

By Ben Maddox

I OFTEN wonder how anyone as quiet and gentle as Fay Wray ever found the steps up to the enviable position she holds in Hollywood. Really, here is no fantastic creature who can easily manage to be spectacular. Fay isn't obviously "different." She never pushes. Certainly, she hasn't thrived because of publicity or pull. Still, without scoring extraordinary hits and with nothing sensational in her private life, she always has leading roles awaiting her.

Unquestionably, Fay is far from ordinary, however. She's active on the Hollywood scene again today after "time out." Her deliberate disappearance was characteristic. At the apparent peak of her popularity—abruptly no more Wray! The girl who seemed to be in practically every other film no longer was current or coming to your pet movie palace. Minus ballyhoo, she cancelled contracts with two major studios to hie six thousand miles from the husband, home and success she loves so much, and did so unhesitatingly.

If you'll remember, just two years ago she was the busiest of all heroines, setting the record for numerous performances. Even that was puzzling—thanks to making the least fuss in the town where you're supposed to be so assertive, she had her name sparkling on the most marquees.

Her fade-out was called rushed by casual acquaintances. Actually, it wasn't—although she settled all her Hollywood affairs, packed, and was off within the space of three days. There were a hundred matters to attend (Continued on page 87)

Jeanette MacDonald and Madge Evans tell you what

IT WAS a California sizzler the day that Jeanette MacDonald and the photographer got together for the smart pictures you gaze upon this month. A fortunate angle to the tedious business of photographing was the fact that Jeanette didn't have to budge out of her own cool house. And since the day was such a scorcher, it made my subject of the right clothes for midsummer a very pertinent one.

Usually getting a star to pose for fashion pictures on a day's rest from the studio is a job that brings dubious looks from her press agent, sour grimaces from her pet cameraman and an embarrassing air of forbearance from la belle, the star. Not so with Jeanette MacDonald, who is one of the grander people in the cinema set. Free from the "Maytime" set, where she and Nelson Eddy are warbling again, she not only posed in the best looking things from her own closet but, what's more, she invited us to come right on out to her house so that the whole thing could be done in a comfortable, clubby fashion.

Jeanette, who loves to act a bit giddy and has a swell sense of humor, actually is a very conservative soul. You notice it in everything she does and especially in her home—a charming house, quietly elegant in all its appointments. This same feeling of quiet good taste is evident in her clothes. She has a small wardrobe for one who could buy anything she likes and she doesn't indulge herself in extravagant clothes just to show them off in competition with the other stars. She buys only what she needs and, once a year, she gives herself an expensive present. Last year it was a beautiful star sapphire; this year it was some lovely furs. As a result, Jeanette is never bored by having too much and she can get as much of a kick out of saving up for a big purchase as you or I.

Quizzing her on what her tastes run to in clothes, I discovered the following interesting and revealing fashion whims.

She can't see any reason why redheads have to shun red! Being a golden redhead herself, she continually wears both red and pink. The reds she selects are on the orange cast and the pinks are in the pastel range. For instance, she showed me the printed jacket dress on page 57, which has multicolored small flowers scattered over a black background. The predominant shade is a lipstick red which is echoed in the patent leather belt on the dress and also in the buttons. And her black sailor is banded in grosgrain ribbon of the same shade.

This print, by the way, is one of the mid-summer costumes Jeanette finds most comfortable and cool. The box jacket with slightly extended shoulder detail, is worn only on the cooler days—the dress beneath being ideal for a warm day without it.

People Notice Skin Faults

LINES
"SHE'S LOOKING OLD"

LARGE PORES
"SHE'S LOSING HER LOOKS"

BLEMISHES
"HER SKIN IS NEVER CLEAR"

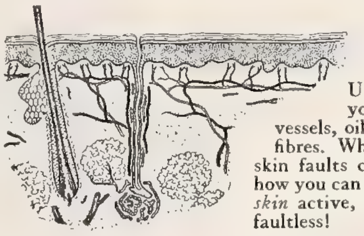
Miss Dorothy Day: "Pond's Cold Cream keeps my skin free from little lines."

These faults start in your Under Skin—and there's where you must treat them

A GLANCE at your skin—and people form opinions! A single blemish . . . "Her skin's never clear." Tired lines creeping in . . . "She's looking worn and old." The first coarse pores . . . "She's losing her good looks!"

Things you yourself hardly notice. But they are there—giving you away, sometimes unjustly.

You can change all that! . . . Surprise everybody with a glorious new impression of your skin—in a few short weeks. You must begin at once to fight those faults people notice. Fight them right where they begin—in your underskin. Look at the skin diagram below. See, just under the skin, all the tiny oil glands, blood vessels, skin cells, which rush life to your outer skin—keep it free of flaws. When they lose vigor, skin faults begin.



Good looks start here . . . Under the skin you see are blood vessels, oil glands, nerves, fibres. When these fail—skin faults come . . . Read how you can keep this underskin active, your outer skin faultless!

But you can keep them active! Rouse that underskin, by the faithful use of Pond's deep-skin treatment—and those little faults will quickly go!

Pond's Cold Cream is made with fine, specially processed oils which go deep. It lifts out all dirt and make-up—freshens your skin immediately. Now—pat in a second application, briskly. Feel the failing underskin waken. Circulation more active. Soon oil glands, cells are acting normally.

Do this regularly. In a few weeks your skin will be noticed by everyone, but for a different reason . . . It's so fresh and clear and smooth . . . beautiful!

More than cleansing—this way

Here's the famous Pond's method:

Every night, cleanse with Pond's Cold Cream. Watch it bring out all the dirt, make-up, skin secretions. Wipe it all off! . . . Now pat in more cream briskly. Rouse that failing underskin. Set it to work again—for that clear, smooth, line-free skin you want.

Every morning, and during the day, repeat this treatment with Pond's Cold Cream. Your skin becomes softer, finer, every time. Powder goes on beautifully.

Start in at once. The coupon brings a special 9-treatment tube of Pond's Cold Cream.

Miss Bettina Belmont

"I keep my skin in good condition with Pond's Cold Cream. It never lets blackheads, coarse pores, or blemishes come out on my skin."

SPECIAL 9-TREATMENT TUBE

and 3 other Pond's Beauty Aids

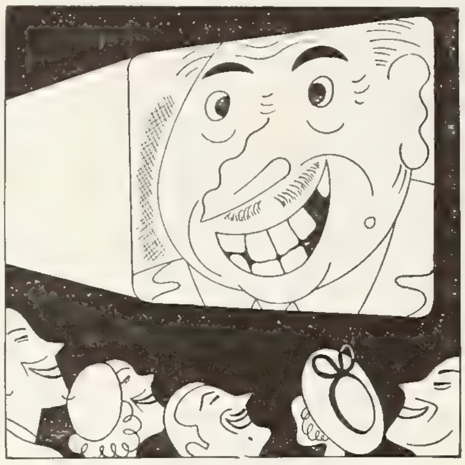
$5.00 PRIZE LETTER

Newsreel Monstrosities

I believe that I am expressing a widespread sentiment in repudiating a prevalent newsreel nuisance; namely, the custom of inflicting upon a plaintive public full-sized close-ups of men and women currently in the public eye.



When Johnny Q. Public appears in the newsreels, the audience has a laugh.

These close-ups occupying every available inch of space on the screen, so thoroughly exaggerate facial contours and imperfections that the innocent victim of the "exposure" invariably resembles the hero of an Ed Wynn opera. And when the photographic subject reveals his or her bridgework in a wide range smile . . . but you doubtlessly get the idea by now.

Now, broadly speaking, the monstrosities gaping at us from the newsreel are healthy and by no means unattractive individuals in private life. But when they pose au naturel, without poise or preparatory attention from a Max Factor, the merciless lens record their floundering features with about the same degree of fidelity with which a radio of the vintage of '21 would reproduce the voice of today's radio stars. To make matters worse, the close-ups are sustained at times for as long as two minutes or more while the news commentator explains the reason for the aforementioned victim's movie debut.—Emanual Barton, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Not Fair to Shirley

Little Miss Temple unquestionably merits all the superlatives heaped upon her. She's a surprisingly intelligent being. But, oh dear, her pictures become successively worse and nobody admits it. Why doesn't someone see that she gets a good story? She hasn't had one since "Baby Take a Bow." Children may enjoy the things she's in, but a good many adults have to go along and be bored. It's not really fair to the fine little actress. Even so lovely a child as she cannot bear the whole weight of a mediocre picture on her small shoulders.

Give her a smaller part—a little less singing and dancing and a little more sense—or else make it frankly a musical comedy. But don't hold up dramatic scenes for the sake of a little tapping up and down a flight of stairs. Put her in a good story and the whole world will applaud her.—Selma Katz, Brockton, Mass.

The Fan Mail Problem

We average people want to think that the movie stars are real, down to earth people. One way in which we can tell them how much we like them and how much they appreciate us (if they do) is by fan mail. I should think their fan mail would be handled better. Of course, not all of them are alike, but when you ask for a picture or even an autograph in most cases your request is ignored. It seems to me that all of the stars could find time to answer such requests as these. If they can't do it personally, why don't they hire a secretary? In the long run I should think it would pay them. For it would prove to us that they take a real interest in the people who admire them so much and it makes us feel as though they were friends of ours.

YOU'RE THE TOP BABY!

A Massachusetts reader says they're not being fair to little Miss Temple.

I have received two very lovely pictures, plus autographs signed personally, from two famous movie stars. I liked them very much prior to this, but my admiration has increased since they were so nice.—M. Jackson, Schaghticoke, N. Y.

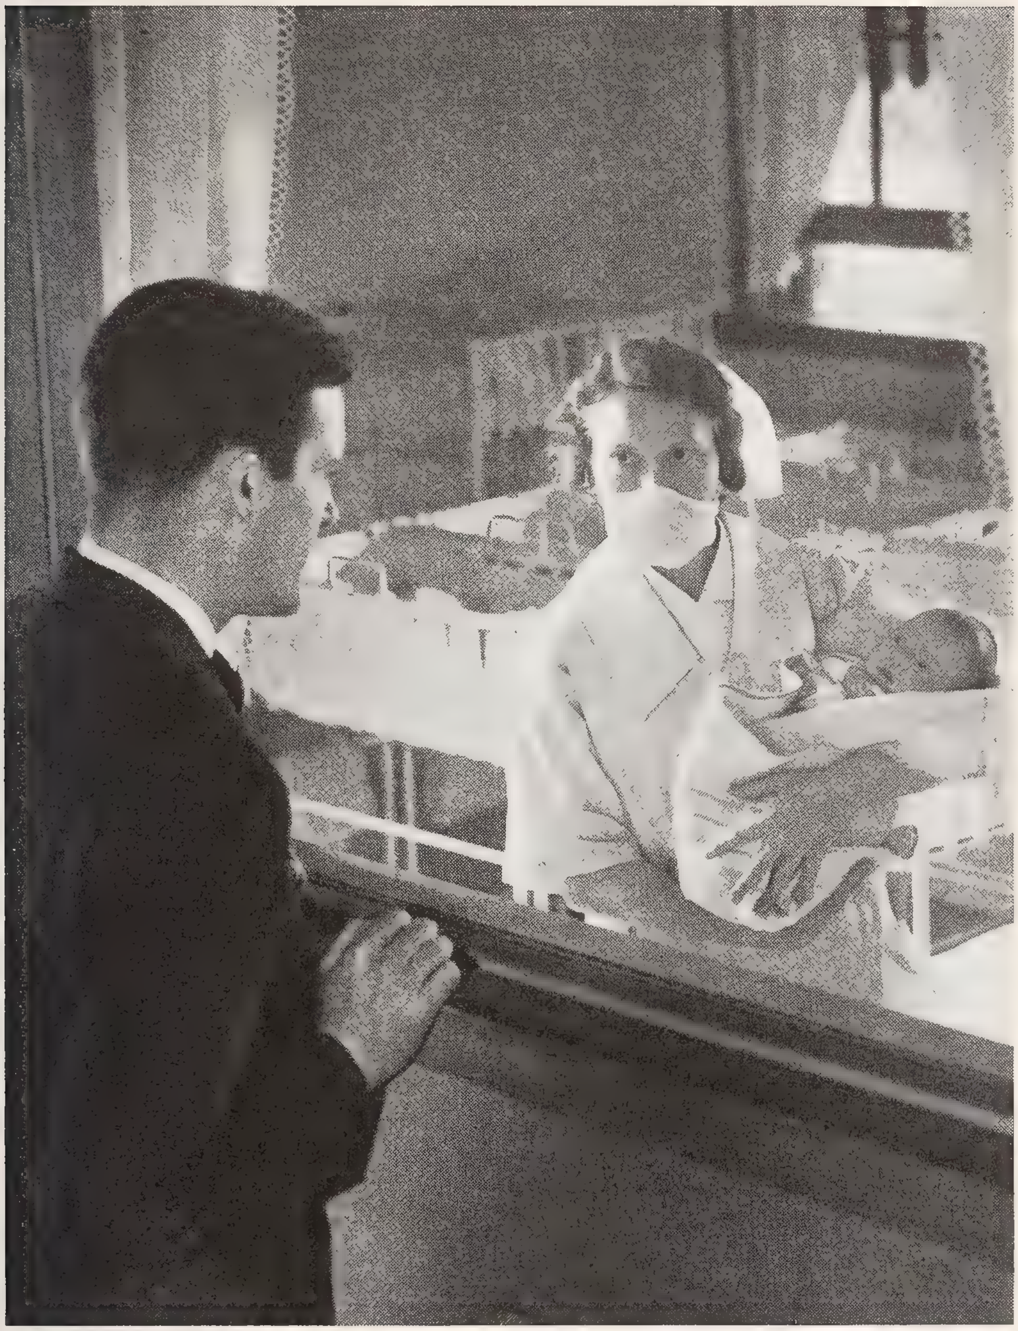
Baby in Wonderland!

Special care . . . special foods . . .
even a special laxative . . . no wonder he thrives!



YOUR DOCTOR will tell you that it takes a special kind of care to bring up a healthy baby today.

He prescribes a special food formula. He advises special baby soap . . . special baby powder . . . yes, even special baby dishes.

In the field of laxatives, doctors say the same reasoning should follow. They say that a baby's laxative should be made especially for him too. It's logical, isn't it? For if his system is too delicate for adult food, it is also too delicate for "adult" laxatives. Yes, even in "half-doses."

Fletcher's Castoria is one laxative you can give your children with perfect peace of mind. All its ingredients are printed on every carton. It is made especially—and only—for children. There isn't a single thing in it that could possibly harm the tiniest infant system. It contains no harsh drugs, no narcotics.

It functions chiefly in the lower bowel and gently stimulates the natural muscular movement — in much the same manner as in normal evacuation. It doesn't upset the stomach — as some "adult" laxatives would do. Nor will it cause cramping pains. It is a child's laxative, pure and simple—and we recommend it for nothing else.

And—Fletcher's Castoria has a pleasant taste. Children take it gladly. And doctors say it's important that they should. For the very act of forcing a child to take a bad-tasting laxative can be so shocking to his nervous system that it can upset his entire digestion.

Why not get a bottle tonight? Ask for the Family-Size. It saves you money. The signature Chas. H. Fletcher appears on every carton.

Star Summer Suggestions

"I've always thought that that same idea would work beautifully with most meal-planning and that one outstanding treat on each menu would make everyone overlook whatever possible shortcomings the meal might have otherwise."

"Yes," laughed Bob, the irrepressible, "sort of like telling an actor, 'Well that was a bum picture I just saw you in but you gave a swell performance!' "

"Hardly that," demurred Betty Montgomery, "but you must admit that a good performance will lift a mediocre film to a higher rating. So why shouldn't the same hold true at the table?

"There are countless out-of-the-ordinary dishes to supply some degree of originality to a menu. These special treats can come out of the oven, out of the garden, out of the sea and even out of cans and boxes. It's largely a question of tasty combinations, correct seasonings and attractive appearance. And, of course, we must not forget—particularly in summer—the many delicious dishes that come out of the refrigerator and its freezing trays, all ready and waiting for your appreciation. I can think of many such dishes that, without being one bit elaborate or difficult, have pleased us and delighted our friends."

"In all modesty, we think they're swell!" declared Bob, laughingly, and then excused himself to go off for an hour's practice in his newest sport, fencing—leaving us gals to discuss Bob's favorite foods.

A FINE lot of dishes they turned out to be, too, these "out-of-the-ordinary" treats that would make a festive occasion of any meal! Only two of the foods mentioned by Mrs. Montgomery come out of the oven. And these come out after but the shortest of visits to the oven's hot interior. One is a bran and corn meal combination that is spread thinly, baked quickly and then cut into narrow strips for serving. It is equally good served as a breakfast hot bread or with a salad or a jellied soup. Of course, you, too, can get a copy of this recipe simply by writing in for it. The coupon at the end of this article will bring you a free copy of this month's recipe leaflet, which contains this and other of Bob's favorite dishes.

The second of the out-of-the-oven dishes I mentioned (and which is also in the leaflet) is a Casserole of Chicken and Mushrooms Supreme. Made up in individual glass baking dishes and served with potato chips and a salad, this provides an excellent one-plate lunch or supper. The nice part of this recipe is that you can make it entirely from canned foods off your pantry shelf, if you choose.

The two Bob Montgomery salad suggestions I am giving you in the leaflet include one out-of-the-garden salad and one that depends for its appeal on a treat that comes out-of-the-sea. The fact that the sea food called for in the latter is that good old dependable, canned salmon, is a feature that makes this salad practical even for those far removed from the ocean. In contrast with the pink salmon meat, you have the tempting color of green peppers —but why go into that now, when the recipe in the leaflet will tell you how to make it in greater detail than I have space to go into here.

The out-of-the-refrigerator suggestions are so many that I can only skim off the cream of the crop. Probably the most outstanding one is Toasted Cocoanut Almond Pie—a refrigerator recipe that is a great favorite with the guests of the Bob Montgomerys. Pie from a refrigerator? My, yes! There are many of these refrigerator pies that you can make, but I consider this one of the most pleasing, both in flavor and appearance.

Let's see now, that makes five unusual recipes for you in this month's leaflet, doesn't it? The out-of-the-oven Bran Cornbread and the Chicken and Mushroom Supreme; the out-of-the-garden and the out-of-the-sea salads I have described briefly and the out-of-the-refrigerator pie. That leaves me just room enough here to give you two recipes for frozen desserts for use in automatic refrigerators and to make a few suggestions of my own which will help you to follow Bob's and Betty's suggestion that, in summer, you serve one outstanding treat at each meal. But don't forget their other suggestion that the "special treat" as well as the meal in general, should be characterized by simplicity.

THAT'S a great little word, "simplicity." I realize that it can mean different things to different people and what may seem "simple" to some might well appear overpoweringly difficult to others. When I say the recipes for Bob Montgomery's favorite foods are "simple," I mean that, in my opinion, they should prove so to anyone who has ever held a mixing spoon in her hand! Another claim that they have to simplicity is that they require no last-minute fuss and bother. You make any one of them up in advance, tuck it away in the refrigerator and forget about it until meal time.

It's truly amazing the results you can achieve in balanced and delicious menus by the judicious inclusion of one or two of the ready-prepared or almost-prepared foods. I don't advocate a meal entirely made up of canned foods, mind you, but I firmly believe that if one or two are included, you can have an appetizing menu with far less work for the cook! A bowl of hot canned soup as an "opener" for an otherwise cold meal, for instance. Or a cold jellied soup or the ever-popular tomato juice as a dainty and welcome introduction to an otherwise uninspired dinner. Icy beverages, of course, at the end of a blistering day—made with canned pineapple or grapefruit juices, or bottled grape juice, or a combination of all three! Canned meats galore which, when attractively served with a fresh vegetable to accompany them, are always most welcome. One canned vegetable, too, at a meal, if you choose.

And then we come to desserts, and the list is a mile long! All I have time to mention here are two. The first, an icebox-cake made with packaged crackers formed into an oblong roll with whipped cream between each cracker and a final coating of whipped cream generously covering the finished roll. These are then sliced diagonally for serving and generally cause a sensation. Tins of chocolate wafers are best for this purpose, but gingersnaps and vanilla wafers may be used.

Then there are the cake mixes which come in boxes and require but a cup of water and a minute's stirring before being put in the oven. And you'll be surprised at the delicious rich gingerbread and devil's food cakes that you can turn out by this method. You don't believe me? All right. You can keep right on then, creaming and sifting, measuring, beating and folding-in. As for me, I'm going to take time off this summer for swimming and still enjoy cakes made the quick way. Served hot with a topping of creamy, cold, ice cream—it can't be beat!

And speaking of ice cream, I suggest that you fill one of your freezing trays immediately with the following mixture. This vanilla ice cream recipe was worked out by the makers of the gas refrigerator and as an example of the simplicity we have been discussing, it stands at the top of the list. You'll also like the Lemoncot Ice recipe, I'm sure. Even if it does take a little longer to prepare, you'll find it simplifies your dessert problem to make up a couple of trays of this ice for future use—for it will keep for days and days.

VANILLA ICE CREAM

¼ cup milk
¼ cup sugar
⅛ teaspoon salt
2½ teaspoons vanilla
1 cup whipping cream

Combine first four ingredients in order given. Stir until sugar has dissolved. Whip cream to a custard consistency, combine with first mixture and turn into freezing tray of automatic refrigerator. Set cold control a little colder than the half-way mark (not at the coldest point). If all the ingredients are thoroughly chilled before using, this cream will freeze to the desired consistency in about one and one half hours.

LEMONCOT ICE

2 cups apricot purée
2 cups water
⅓ cup lemon juice
1 cup sugar
1 egg white
½ cup white karo syrup
2 tablespoons sugar

Force enough tender, boiled, strained apricots through a sieve or food mill to make 2 cups of apricot purée. (If sweetened apricots are used, reduce sugar somewhat.) To the purée add 1 cup of water and the lemon juice. Boil together sugar, karo syrup and remaining cup of water until it forms a soft ball when tried in cold water (240° F. on candy thermometer). Remove from heat, combine with apricot mixture and blend thoroughly. Turn into 2 medium-sized freezing trays. Place in refrigerator and freeze for ½ hour with control set at coldest point. Remove from tray, beat well. Beat egg white until stiff, fold in the 2 tablespoons sugar, then fold egg whites into apricot mixture. Return to refrigerator tray and freeze until firm, stirring well every half hour or so. Serve with cookies, or add a spoonful to a fruit cup.

Information Desk

NOTE: The following biographies are printed by popular demand. They are the ones most frequently requested during the last month by readers who have sent in the coupon at the end of the article. Each coupon has been tabulated, so if you have requested any of these, kindly consider yours automatically responsible.

GEORGE RAFT: Now that he's back on the screen again in "Yours for the Asking" after a temporary absence, his faithful fans are flocking to the fold. So—here are the "vital statistics" you requested. In spite of the fact that Mr. R. is of French, German and Italian descent, George Raft is really his name. Born in Hell's Kitchen in New York City, George attended Public School 169 and later St. Catherine's. During his vacations and after school hours he worked as an electrician's helper for $4.00 a week. That not being lucrative enough, he decided at the age of 15 to become a bantam weight prize fighter. During the next 2 years he fought 25 times, was knocked out 7 and quit the game after his last beating. Following this was the baseball era, in which George signed with the Springfield Club. However, he was dropped after 2 seasons because of his poor batting, though as a fielder he did well by himself. Next, he became a professional gigolo at Churchill's in New York, where Rudolph Valentino worked in a similar capacity. After Rudy departed for Hollywood and the movies, he sent for Raft to be his double, but died before the latter could get there. Nothing daunted, George took up dancing in vaudeville, then in legitimate shows and night clubs. He introduced the Charleston to New York and later to London, becoming an international sensation and appearing in all the capitals of Europe. Back to New York, vaudeville and night clubs again, he finally ended up in Hollywood for his first picture, "Quick Millions," in 1931. Mr. Raft is 5 feet 10 inches tall, weighs 155 pounds and has shiny black hair and light brown eyes. Baseball still remains his favorite sport and he likes to watch prize fights and horse races. He and his wife have been separated for several years, and Virginia Pine still seems to be the "first lady" of his heart. Under contract to Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon St., Los Angeles, Calif., he will probably appear next in "Playboy."

JULIE HUNTER, Chicago, Ill.—The reason why you haven't seen Charles Laughton on the screen lately is a very simple one. He hasn't made any pictures since "Mutiny on the Bounty." Seriously though, he's been appearing on the English stage and is now marking time until the script is ready for him and his wife, Elsa Lanchester, to begin work on "Rembrandt," which will be a biographical film of that famous master's life. Methinks it will be well worth waiting for!

ALAN BAXTER: Maybe you don't recognize the name, but when you know that this is the young man who played gangster Babe Wilson in "Mary Burns, Fugitive" you'll catch wise. He's 25 years old, 5 feet 11 inches tall and has light brown hair and brown eyes. Born in East Cleveland, Ohio, he is the only son of the president of a leading bank in that city. Educated in Cleveland Heights, he attended Williams University from which he graduated in 1930, and took a post graduate course at Yale's Baker's Workshop, where he specialized in Polish and other dialect roles. Next Alan served as apprentice in the Group Theatre and then the Theatre Guild. While appearing in "The Black Pit" Katharine Hepburn saw him and was so impressed that she persuaded Walter Wanger to sign him for a picture, sight unseen. This was "Mary Burns, Fugitive," in which he made his screen debut. While at Williams, Baxter was on the track and wrestling teams. He is a good swimmer and golfs in the low 80's. His hobbies are drawing, clay modeling and playwrighting. He has written many musical comedy sketches, two of them in the New York hit, "Life Begins at 8:40," two in "Calling All Stars," and three in "Thumbs Up." On April 26 he was married to Barbara William. His other pictures have been "Trail of the Lonesome Pine," "13 Hours by Air," "Big Brown Eyes," "The Case Against Mrs. Ames" and "Parole." His next is not scheduled at the moment. Write him at Walter Wanger Productions, 1040 N. Las Palmas Ave., Hollywood, Calif.

MADELEINE LUTHERMAN, Philadelphia, Pa.—Here are the answers to some of your questions, though not all. Joseph Calleia has appeared in "Public Hero Number One," "Riffraff," "Tough Guy" and "Exclusive Story." Yes, Tullio Carminati has sung in several of his pictures, "Paris in Spring" being the last. Frank Lawton is married to Evelyn Laye. Douglass Montgomery is 5 feet 11½ inches tall, weighs 178 pounds, is 27 years old and not married. Monroe Owsley is not married, either.

FRANCES LANGFORD: Born in Lakeland, Fla., about 23 years ago, this young contralto has gone a long way in a comparatively short time. Miss Langford's mother, Annie Newbern, was a concert pianist so Frances comes naturally by her love of music. As a young girl she gained local popularity by singing at school and church entertainments. She attended Southern College where she sang soprano in the glee club. Then came the tonsil operation from which Miss Langford emerged, amazingly enough, a contralto. While in college she appeared on a commercial radio program in Tampa, and it was there that Rudy Vallee discovered her during one of her programs. Greatly impressed, he arranged for her to be guest star on his next radio hour. In June, 1931, Frances trekked to New York where she sang on several commercial programs and took a try at the stage in a show which failed. Next came vaudeville, which was highly successful and resulted in her obtaining a big radio contract. This she supplemented with work in New York cabarets and vaudeville until she was summoned to Hollywood to appear in "Every Night at Eight." She stands 5 feet 3½ inches, weighs only 100 pounds and has a dark complexion with raven black hair. Her favorite foods are fried chicken and Mexican chili and beans. She likes horseback riding, golf, sad music and amateur photography. Miss Langford is not married. She is under contract to Walter Wanger Productions, 1040 N. Las Palmas, Hollywood, Calif., for whom she recently completed "Palm Springs."

DOROTHY WASKOW, Ashland, Pa.—Claire Trevor was born in New York City on March 8. Mae West's birthday is August 17 and her birthplace, Brooklyn, N. Y. Cesar Romero was also born in New York, his birthday being February 15. Rosalind Russell hails from Waterbury, Conn., and her date of birth is June 4. Kitty Carlisle was born in New Orleans, La., but does not give her birthdate.

BUCK JONES: This gentleman-cowboy's life story is almost as exciting and full of adventure as his pictures. Born Charles Jones in Vincennes, Ind., on December 4, 1889, of American parents, he was educated in the public schools of Indianapolis. For a while he worked as a mechanic, but later went to Montana and took up the life of a cowboy. Next he joined the U. S. Cavalry for service in the Philippines. On his return Buck was engaged as an expert rider with Miller Brothers "101" Ranch Wild West Show. During the World War he again answered the call to battle and went to France with the First Air Squadron, remaining in Europe after the Armistice. He often performed his remarkable feats of horsemanship before the various crowned heads of Europe. It was one of these exhibitions that brought him to the attention of William Fox, who signed him for pictures, and Buck has been making Westerns these many (over 15) years ever since. He is married to Odille Osborne, and Maxine is their daughter's name. Mr. Jones' hobby is mechanics, his height 6 feet and his weight 173 pounds. He has gray eyes and brown hair. Under contract to Universal Studios, Universal City, Calif., his next two pictures will be "Ride 'Em Cowboy" and "Boss Rider of Gun Creek."

MARIANNE EDDY, no address—Nelson Eddy and Jeanette MacDonald will start work shortly on "Maytime." According to all reports, Nelson Eddy is all the name he has. James Dunn was born on November 2, 1905, which makes him just 30. He's American of Irish descent. Richard Barthelmess was born on May 9, 1897. Alison Skipworth was born on July 25.

JEAN HARLOW: She was born Harlean Carpentier on March 3, 1911, in Kansas City, Mo. Her father was Dr. Frank Carpentier, a dentist. Until Jean was ten she attended the Barstow School for Girls in K.C., then moved west where the Hollywood School for Girls continued her education. The next stop was Kansas City again, and the Bigelow School, followed by a spell at Ferry Hall in Lake Forest, Ill. Beginning her marital troubles early, Jean married Charles F. McGrew II when she was only 16, and moved to Hollywood to live. Divorce came two years later. On a dare she registered at the Central Casting Bureau and shortly thereafter was assigned to an extra role in "Moran of the Marines" with Richard Dix. Hal Roach was her next sponsor, under whom she played in a Laurel and Hardy comedy released in 1929. Forced to ask for a release from her Roach contract because of family pressure, Jean spent the next 8 months doing nothing. Trying her luck again, she obtained a part in Clara Bow's "Saturday Night Kid." Through an acquaintanceship with Ben Lyon and James Hall, who were appearing in "Hell's Angels," she was awarded the lead in that picture. And that, dear readers, was the beginning of the platinum blonde rage and Jean's success. Jean is 5 feet 3½ inches tall, weighs 109 pounds, has gray-blue eyes and "brownette" hair. She loves to entertain and is an excellent cook. Her hobby is collecting phonograph records and she is the proud owner of one dachshund, two Pomeranians and one cat. Jean cannot play any musical instrument, but enjoys golf, tennis, swimming and riding. Her second husband was Paul Bern, her third—Hal Rosson. William Powell and Jean seem to be very fond of each other, but deny all rumors of marriage, past or future. "Suzy" is her last picture and "Love on the Run," with Robert Montgomery, will probably be her next. You may write Miss Harlow at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Calif., where she is under contract.

GEORGE BRENT: In case the characteristics have escaped you, Mr. Brent is out-and-out Irish. Born on March 15, 1904, in Dublin, Ireland, under the name of George Nolan, he was the son of a newspaper man. As a boy he had two ambitions—a military career and to get out of school. For 2 years George was a sailor, was once a sheep herder, worked for 9 months in a diamond mine and for 6 as a blacksmith. Educated in Dublin at the National University, George's interest in the drama began at the latter institution, and shortly after graduation he joined the Abbey Theatre in Dublin. Then came the Irish Rebellion in which George became a rebel secret service man for 2 years, but was forced to flee to London, and from thence to Canada. Another 2 years were devoted to playing stock companies throughout the United States. In New York he made his first Broadway appearance in "Those We Love," then as Alice Brady's leading man in "Love, Honor and Betray," in which Clark Gable was also playing. Broadway led George to Hollywood, where he found a long term contract and a wife, Ruth Chatterton, with whom he played in 4 pictures, and from whom he is now divorced. To keep fit he indulges in his favorite sports—tennis, horseback riding and deep sea fishing. His favorite dish is Irish stew, does a lot of reading and goes in strongly for pets. Is an expert chess player and plays the piano very well. George is 6 feet 1 inch tall, weighs 170 pounds and has hazel eyes and blue-black hair. Very much in demand as a leading man, his next two pictures will be "Give Me Your Heart," with Kay Francis, and "God's Country and the Woman" with Bette Davis. Write him at Warner Brothers Studios, Burbank, Calif.

M. N. E., Wheeling, W. Va.—Yes, Kenny Baker was the office boy in "King of Burlesque." Jimmy Dunn was once married to Addie Louise Barton.

MARY BRIAN: Her fans have been welcoming her return to the screen after what seems like a long absence. Born in Corsicana, Texas, on February 17, 1908, she received her education in Dallas. Throughout her childhood Miss Brian displayed natural talent for drawing, at the same time dreaming of becoming a picture star. Believing that Los Angeles would offer Mary a broader field to further both of these interests, her mother took her there to live. Shortly after their arrival, Mary won a beauty contest, then a "charming personality" contest, through which she was chosen for the role of Wendy in "Peter Pan." This started her on the road to fame and popularity. Her favorite pastimes are swimming, dancing and drawing. She is 5 feet 2 inches tall, weighs 110 pounds and has dark brown hair and hazel eyes. Although Mary has been acclaimed the most popular girl in Hollywood, she has never married. On her return from England where she made a picture, Miss Brian and Cary Grant were seen together on every occasion and were rumored engaged. To date nothing has come of it, but only time will tell. "Spendthrift," with Henry Fonda and Pat Paterson, is her most recent picture, and "Three Married Men" will be her next. You may write her at the Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon St., Los Angeles, Calif.

JOSEPHINE CONERO, Highland Falls, N. Y.—Harry Barris played the role of the pianist in the cabaret scene from "Show Boat."

LLOYD NOLAN: For one who is so seldom the romantic hero of a picture, Mr. Nolan has attained great popularity and acclaim. Born in Los Angeles, Calif., on August 11, 1903, Lloyd attended the Santa Clara preparatory school and Stanford University, where he went in for football, basketball and baseball. Right in the middle of his college work he took off for Europe and a world tour, after which he resumed his studies at the University, this time devoting himself to dramatics. In 1927 Mr. Nolan joined the Pasadena Community Theatre. Having thus obtained a footing in the theatrical profession, he worked for Edward Everett Horton in "The Queen's Husband," then came to New York. He next joined a road company, returned to New York, played stock with Helen Hayes and Pat O'Brien, did another road show, played more stock and finally appeared in "Reunion in Vienna" with Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne. After this he appeared in 4 more plays on Broadway before being signed to a contract by Paramount in July, 1934. His first picture was "Stolen Harmony," which was released in 1935. He is 5 feet 10½ inches tall, weighs 176 pounds and has brown hair and eyes. He is married to Mell Efird, a young actress whom he met while appearing in "Sweet Stranger." They have been man and wife since May 23, 1933. Mr. Nolan's next picture will be "Texas Rangers" and you can reach him at the Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon St., Los Angeles, Calif.

first job, he "worked over" Cary Grant and Sylvia Sidney. Through a friend he was sent to the production manager of Paramount, who asked the casting director to do something for him. The casting director had nothing for him but sent him to another executive, who personally saw to it that he got a new street cleaner's brush and a job sweeping the rooves of the sound stages.

His first day's work put him on top of the stage in which Sidney and Grant were making "Madame Butterfly" and in Michael's own words, "I saw them from the highest gallery seat I'd ever known."

Pull got him on the Paramount night shift, so that he could go to M-G-M's talent school during the day. M-G-M made a test of him. Then they dropped him from the school!

BEFORE going on, let's delve into his background. Mike's real name isn't Michael at all, or even Whalen. It's Kenneth. But don't let the Kenneth fool you, his last name is Shovlin, and his father was a contractor. Joseph Kenneth Shovlin it is. Irish as they come, and as contrary.

His father wanted him to be a contractor, so J. Kenneth decided to be a concert pianist. But his dad was Irish, too, and he ended up in a ten-cent store. At least, "ended" so far as business was concerned, for the next we learn of Michael he was on the stage, as a captain of the guards in "Twelfth Night." After that, he turned to radio, where he sang baritone "often, but not well," to use his own words.

About that time James Montgomery Flagg asked this six-feet-two, curly-haired, blue-eyed Irisher, to pose for some of his illustrations. "So," says Mike, "before long I discovered myself sitting for sketches and vowing by St. Patrick I'd never pose in the nude."

And so Michael came to Hollywood. Through his friend, James Montgomery Flagg, and other good contacts, he signed with one of the outstanding artists' agents in Hollywood.

"Stay unknown," they instructed him. "Don't let your face become too well known. Don't let people think you've been kicking around and that nobody wants you."

"I didn't have any trouble following their orders," explains Michael, "because I had all sorts of help in staying unknown. Too much, in fact. Before long I think I was the 'unknownest' person in Hollywood.

"In order to make the film industry notice me, I played in 'The Love Chiselers' at the Belasco Theatre in Los Angeles in 1934, and then I had a role in 'The Girl of the Golden West.' But when I got a good look at our audiences I knew I was still following my agent's instructions.

"Then followed a round of the little theatres hereabouts, in which I played at nothing a week. We were all playing at no salary, hoping the movie casting directors would see us. My hopes were centered on the directors themselves, as practically every studio had tested me in New York and had turned me down.

MONTH after month passed and I hung on. My money was all gone, and I worked as a laborer at the studios whenever I could get work. On rare occasions I got a chance as an extra for a few days. The money I earned I put into clothes and stocked up my little flat with canned foods and dried beans, so I could eat during the lean times and when I was doing the stage shows.

"Things really came to a head when I was playing in 'Common Flesh' in Jim Timony's Hollytown Theatre, also at nothing per. I was down to my last dollar again, living with friends who had a big house nearby. I acted as their houseman, chauffeur, and what-not, in return for board and room.

"It was then that the most eventful week of my life rolled in—the week of September 29th to October 5th, 1935. That Monday Shubert bought 'Common Flesh' and offered me a three-year contract. At that moment Goldwyn decided to make a test of me. Why I should stall Shubert waiting for that test, I didn't know. I'd had tests in Hollywood before—oodles of them. Hollywood disappointments were a steady diet for me. I'd even been set for a fine part out at M-G-M, the part of Captain Cook in 'The Barretts of Wimpole Street,' only to have a battle staged over at the studio on account of it, with Ralph Forbes replacing me on the last day.

"Anyhow, I did stall Shubert, and on Wednesday Goldwyn tested me. It happened that my test was scheduled for six o'clock, as the Louis-Baer fight went on. So the crew testing me told me to do anything I wanted to, and turned on the radio to get the fight.

"On Thursday Goldwyn notified me that they didn't like the test and would make another Monday. Discouraged and, finally, willing to give up, I told my agent I was going to sign the Shubert contract, go home for a rest, and then go back on the stage.

"I simply had to do something, as my friends had sold their house and were moving into a small apartment Saturday. My agent urged me not to sign until he could get a test I had made at Fox to show the then recently organized 20th Century studios. Darryl Zanuck had asked to see one of the tests Fox had taken, but they couldn't be found."

It seems that Lilian Barkley, dramatic coach and talent scout for Fox, had falsely reported that no tests of Whalen were on file. Confident of his rare talent, and disgusted with the tests she had seen of him, this woman was determined he should have a fair chance. She knew that on account of his poverty, his discouragement and careless tests every film record of this young man was unfavorable.

SINCE they could not find a test at Fox, they sent over to another studio for a Whalen test. It happened that in the test, which was shown the head of 20th Century, Michael had a mustache, and when Zanuck wanted to know if that dud was Whalen, the man showing the test said: "No. Somebody has been pulling a fast one. That isn't Michael Whalen. We haven't any test of him."

Therefore Zanuck ordered a test for that night, Friday. Saturday morning of that eventful week found Michael sitting on the stairs in a house that was empty, except for his own luggage.

"While sitting there," explained Michael, "I made up my mind to borrow enough money to ship my baggage back home and to eat on while I was hitch-

Finds Way To Have Young Looking Skin at 35!

SMART, modern women no longer submit to the tragedy of "old skin" just because they are 30, 35, 40! A wonderful new creme, applied at night like cold cream, acts a scientific way to free the skin of that veil of semi-visible darkening particles which ordinary creams cannot remove after a certain age. So gentle and quick—often only 5 days is time enough to bring out a glorious rose petal softness and fineness and white, clear look of youth. And, the way it eliminates common surface blemishes—ugly pimples, blackheads, freckles—is a revelation! Ask for this creme—Golden Peacock Bleach Creme at all drug and department stores.

hiking to New York.

"Zanuck saw my test at noon Saturday, and at one o'clock I was out there signing a contract. At that moment I had exactly twenty-seven cents to my name, and nowhere to sleep.

"But my agent came to my rescue. He fixed it so I could move into a very fine apartment, one of the swankiest in Hollywood. Not that I felt swanky, but it was the only place where I could get credit till I drew my first pay check from the studio.

"Then I borrowed enough from my agent to eat on for a week, and to make a down payment on a new car." Yes, that's how Irish Michael is, a new car the same day his total assets were twenty-seven cents. But the boy was canny at that, for he bought it in six payments, so he would have it paid for and transportation back home when his six months' option was up. Hollywood bumps, hundreds of them, had taught Mike always to expect the worst.

"Of course, I kept pinching myself all that afternoon," Michael said, "just to be sure it wasn't another rosy dream that might turn into a nightmare. I wanted to tell my mother all about it. So I decided to make a night call, as I couldn't afford to pay the day phone rates to New York. But I didn't want to get my mother up at all hours of the night, so I decided to wait till it was seven o'clock in the morning in New York. When I called her, I told her that at last I had real news.

" 'What time is it there?' she wanted to know.

" 'It's four o'clock in the morning,' I answered. 'But mother—'

" 'That's all right, Joseph,' she replied. 'Go to bed now, that's a good boy, and you'll be all right in the morning.' "

And what is Michael Whalen really like? Happy, but rather inclined to be quiet. Whimsical at times, with a full share of Irish humor. Somewhat of a fatalist, naturally, or he never could have stuck out the two years of buffeting and practical jokes Fate exposed him to during the period the studios were playing badminton with his future.

Your Ten Pet Alibis

first two are in most cases the forty-year-old figure's deadliest enemy. "Oh, if I could only go to a masseuse! Oh, if only I had more time! Oh, if I could afford to pay one hundred dollars for a simple little afternoon model, instead of seven ninety-five!"

If it is any comfort to you children, let me tell you that as far as reducing goes, ordinary massage, in the main, is an insidious thing. Makes you comfy, relaxed, soft and increases your appetite. I've taken unnecessary suet off movie stars to get them ready for a particular role, and made it possible for them to keep their contracts. I've taught them to do the same things you have to do to stay slim, but not by ordinary massage. It takes more than a rub-down to reduce properly. My system is going for the glands, the proper ones, normalizing them as much as possible, so they do their work in regulating the system which in turn carries off the surplus in a healthy manner. I have never taught my system to anyone. Never trained anyone in my method. So, babies, if you want results my way, listen to mama. And if some ambitious young person tells you she uses Madame Sylvia's System, throw her out on her ear! There is no such thing!

So much for massage. As for leisure! My dears, I know so-o-o many women with oddles of time on their hands, and you can be darn sure most of them have oodles of pounds on their faces, middles and rears.

CLOTHES. Dress a feather bed up in a Hattie Carnegie model, and it's still a feather bed. Now if you want to skim down a feather bed shape (which you have heretofore regarded as "natural" for your age) that's something else again. Here is the lowdown on a handy little trick for stubborn bumps. You can do this to any part of your body except the breasts. Take hold of the offending bulge with the heels of the hands and the fingertips. Get a good grip. Squeeze, using the heels of the hands for pressure. Let your flesh squoosh through the hands. Don't pinch yourself, that's wrong. And another thing, if a masseuse or anyone else tries to do this for you and makes you black and blue, throw her out on her ear, because anyone that makes you black and blue is incompetent. If your skin is exceptionally tender, go easy, but most skin will stand this with only a slight ensuing soreness that doesn't amount to a row of beans.

MANY people get stiff as they get older. Through improper care mucus collects in the system. Here is a wonderful addition to your diet to keep off the above unattractive ailment: chop up a lot of red and white raw cabbage, very fine. Squeeze a little lemon juice on it. It's good. Or you can have the raw cabbage, either color, with chopped apples and a little lemon juice.

Alibi number two: "I haven't time to exercise—I work all day." By "work" you mean, don't you, that you're busy about the house all day? Darn busy, too, many of you. Or perhaps your office lasts from nine to five. What kind of an excuse is that? I work all day, too, so do the movie stars—if they're lucky.

Listen to me, busy housewives! Take time. After all you should be respectful enough of your body to give it fifteen minutes of your time out of the twenty-four hours. My gosh, you probably spend that much time dishing the dirt with Mrs. Jones over the back fence or on the telephone. As soon as you finish reading the exercise below, I want you to put this book down and do it. Do you hear?

And now you business women. Did you ever think of getting up fifteen minutes earlier in the morning? You may suffer untold agonies at first, but think what a hero you'll be. Furthermore, once you stir your rusty bones and do a few of my systematic exercises, you'll work better, lose your jumpy nerves and sleep like babes (but not on the job, please!). Start with this one stunt: Hop out of bed and stand near an open window. Feet about ten inches apart, toes turned slightly in. Arms over head. Now bend down and to the left, keeping the knees stiff, and try to touch your fingertips (both hands) behind your left heel. Do it ten times then repeat on the other side. If you're smart you'll sneak this in a couple of times during the day, too. If the boss says anything about it, just tell him to see me.

Cut little alibi number three: "I can't diet when I eat out."

Now, really, I don't want to hear any more about this. The trouble is, babies, when you hand out that one, the mind is weaker than the stomach. Snap out of it. It's just as easy to pick sensible and varied foods. You've got a brain, use it. Even if you must eat in a drug store you can always get soup, and a cream cheese sandwich on whole wheat toast. Or a vegetable plate. Tomato juice, orange juice and some kind of green salad. Keep fruit in the office, instead of candy. If you are visiting, your hostess will not be offended if you say "No, thank you" once in a while to the breads or sauces and gravies which are passed. Nobody will force you to put cream and sugar in a beverage if you don't want it. You can be firm about second helpings. Don't talk to me about eating out. I do it a great percentage of the time. But with me it's very funny. When they know I'm coming, they very carefully clear the decks of any goo. You'd think I was the plague or something!

ALIBI four is that prize nit-witticism which has helped spoil more figures than all the calories in the cook book: "Fat runs in our family." Come now—be honest! Does fat run all the way through your family? Maybe Pop is plump (no wonder—probably loves his bread and gravy), but Mom is slim. Were all your grandparents fat? How about your sisters and cousins and aunts? Did heritage pick on you and you alone to carry the accumulated pounds of your ancestors? Phooey!

Though I'd like to kick this alibi to kingdom come, I'm not saying, mind you, that you may not inherit a tendency to put on weight. But for heaven's sake, why should you let a tendency get the better of you? It beats me why people will fight any other inherited tendency and will just sit back on their haunches and accept a tendency toward fat, when it is so much easier to overcome than baldness, alcoholism or insanity. You may have a struggle, but stop being a sissy—and struggle! It's good for your character. You often hear people say, "She has character in her face," well, hips can have character, too, and should.

Alibi five? Here 'tis: "Never mind, darling, you'll outgrow it." So say mothers to their fat and unhappy children. Just passing the buck, as it were. I wrote an article on very young figure and diet problems last month in MODERN SCREEN, and I'm not going over all that again. But I want to ask you mothers just one question: How do you know she will outgrow it? Are you a fortune teller or something? If you know what's going to happen to your daughter's figure ten years from now, you're a better man than I am, Gunga Din. And not knowing, you can take it from me, darling, that it is a grave mistake to treat her little body with such indifference. If your child is extraordinarily fat and for, apparently, no sufficient reason, see a doctor about it.

Alibi six, of which I shall dispose quickly, is as follows: "I can't watch my diet, because I cook for the family." Really, now, isn't that a stupid thing to say? And what an admission of lack of will power! If your underweight daughter must have cream soup, it will cost you a mere dime and a very few minutes to run up a cup of consomme for yourself. A few flips of the can opener is all it takes. Another thing, when you're preparing a meal, don't nibble and don't sneak in a mouthful of this and another of that. If you want to taste things, be professional about it. Tasting doesn't necessarily mean swallowing you know. Taste it and then do away with it. I know husbands are supposed to have invented that plaintive little ditty, "My wife is on a diet and home isn't home any more." But must you mention diet to him!

ALIBI SEVEN: "I've tried everything on the market to reduce!" My answer to that one is—that's the trouble!

Have I ever told you to take pills and potions? No! Have I ever told you to buy rolling pins or sweat the devil out of yourselves with steam cabinets, electric blankets or similar contraptions? No! A thousand times, no! I'm only telling you common sense things, healthy things. Eat properly. Live properly. Exercise regularly (and properly, I might add). Use your noodle and stay away from quackery and hocus-pocus.

Alibi eight is a sad, sad thing to hear: "I've had children. That's why I'm fat." On page 52 are pictures of three Hollywood stars who have had children—Marlene Dietrich, Joan Bennett, Arline Judge. There are more—Frances Dee, Joan Blondell, Dixie Lee Crosby. You must know, yourself, plenty of women who have had children and who are not fat. Most modern obstetricians will tell you how to ward off creeping avoirdupois after the birth of your baby. They'll give you a diet. They'll give you exercises to put the abdominal muscles back in place. Or, I will, by heck. Here are two, one which you can do two weeks after your confinement, if the birth has been normal.

First an easy one. Get on the bed on your knees and your chest. Hips and derriere way up in the air, chest down flat on the bed. Just stay there for five minutes. Do it a few times each day. It tips the innards back where they belong for one thing, and is grand for the backache.

Exercise two: lie on the floor on your back, bring your legs up in the air without bending the knees. Let them down again, but don't let your feet touch the floor. Start easy, doing it a couple of times without resting and work up to ten, then twenty times.

Alibi nine: "It's my glands!" You bet your life it's your glands. Everybody's everything depends on their glands. They're life itself. Of course, there are cases where definite glandular deficiencies are the cause of overweight. If you're one of them, work with your doctor. But most of the time the fat girl has nothing drastically wrong with her glands. It's her will power that's shot to pieces. And how she loves to simper, "It's my glands," when some one casts an eye on her heavy buttocks. It's an easy way out, thinks she, but baby it'll never get it off!

The last alibi, from fat wives who try to be coy and laugh off their pounds with: "My husband says he loves me as I am." Oh, yeah? You mean your husband, poor guy, is used to you as you are. He's comfortable, perhaps, or polite. Or maybe he has the responsibility of you, your home and your children and has little time or energy left over to go stepping out. Men are creatures of habit. They'll accept what they've got until—well, I hope the "until" never enters your life. But you don't mean love, baby. He's not particularly thrilled by you, though he may be fond of you. He doesn't ache to show you off. You may be a swell housekeeper and an agreeable companion, but what a pity that all the romance and excitement is out of your lives. Wouldn't you like to inject a little and live again the thrills of ten years ago? You would? Well, that means you have to regain that healthy, strong and alluring body you once had.

Two-Career Gal

would forget the story sooner if I just ignored it. I took their advice and stayed silent. Now I can laugh about the legend.

"But what makes the story about the near-blindness funny is that my eyes are improving with age. Every year, I see farther. By the time I'm too old to matter, my vision will be perfect!"

Nearsightedness does not make Joan Bennett a Hollywood oddity. Nor has it threatened her career. But something else, far more serious, once happened to her—almost ending her days as an actress.

"Funny nobody remembers that particular story—which was a true one," she commented. "It was the only serious accident I've ever had. A horse threw me. In the tumble, I fractured my hip. Everybody thought I was going to share the fate of Anna Q. Nilsson, injured in a similar way in a similar accident, and be an invalid for years. I thought so, too; I was in a torment of fear, as well as physical torture. But I was lucky. I had a divine doctor. I was in bed three months, in a cast; then I was two months, getting over my limp. I was off the screen for six months altogether."

Joan tentatively explored the special salad that she had ordered, having given the waiter the recipe, herself. "Now that that's out of the way," she said (referring to the previous conversation, not the salad), "why don't you find out what's happening to me now—what I'm like today?"

So I explored the 1936 Bennett personality.

SHE is the least changed, physically, of any actress who ever has been through the Hollywood glamor mill. Fame has not made her an exotic. In appearance, except for the darkened (brownette) hair, she still is much the same girl who started her screen career as Ronald Colman's leading lady in "Bulldog Drummond." There is an aura of incredible youth around her. She has the agile slenderness, the soft roundness in face and figure, of a girl in her teens. She has more mental poise, more self-assurance, now; but she looks little older. In any group, any man would look at her twice; and any woman would look at her twice twenty times, wondering how she has worked the miracle.

It can't be explained by make-up; she uses cosmetics sparingly. It can't be explained by diet; she eats "everything." How about exercise? "I'm not consistent at it," she told me. "I'm not particularly athletic. I did go bicycling at Palm Springs, and swimming—which I love. I don't want to ride horseback, after what happened the last time. I can't play tennis because its strenuousness might strain my once-broken hip. Golf is an old ladies' game, something I'll play when I'm seventy. I don't like walking just for walking's sake; I must have a destination to enjoy it." So exercise isn't the explanation.

Boredom is a stranger to Joan. Boredom is also a stranger to youth—if youth has an impelling love, a driving ambition. Perhaps the explanation, if there is one, lies there.

By the time that she was eighteen, Joan was married, divorced, and a mother. She determined to devote her life to her small daughter, Diana (familiarly known as Ditty). Too proud to ask her family for help, and untrained for anything else, she decided to try to make her living by acting—which was in her blood. She went on the screen. Ambition to secure Ditty's future drove her forward over the first hurdles, generated the desire to be a movie top-notcher.

She devoted little time to anything besides her child and her career until she had her accident. Then writer Gene Markey, accompanying a friend on a sympathy call to her room, came into her life. She became Mrs. Gene Markey, the mother of small Melinda Markey. Today she has three major absorptions—not just one—besides her career. Three reasons why she never should become bored.

Joan is excited now about building her first home. It is in Holmby Hills, on two acres of ground—enough room to allow a swimming pool, a flower garden, a playground for the children (complete to sand boxes, a merry-go-round, a three-room playhouse, and gym equipment). "I've always been superstitious about owning a house before. Afraid of acquiring possessions. After my first marriage, I went back to New York and wouldn't take a furnished apartment because I wanted to have everything my own. I took an empty apartment and furnished it with great care. And immediately afterward I came to Hollywood and had to give it all up. Ever since, I've rented—except for my beach house at Malibu."

Ditty is now eight, five years older than Melinda, who is known to the family as "Me" Markey. They get along together beautifully despite the disparity in ages. Ditty is quiet, serious and reminds Joan of herself as a child. Melinda shows symptoms of being a prodigy. "She frightens me," Joan explained, "she's so bright."

Ditty goes to public school. "She went to private school for two years and didn't learn a thing. In two weeks in public school, she learned more than she had in the previous two years. She's in the third grade. Eventually she and Melinda will go to St. Margaret's, in Waterbury, Connecticut, where I went."

Joan had just engineered a happy ending to a near-tragedy in her household. Ditty, it seems, had a teddy bear of which she was very fond. (Like her Aunt Constance, Ditty has never liked dolls.) The bear's name was Pooh and he was a present on her fourth birthday. She never went to sleep without him. Finally, in time, he was bald and his ears were gone. Still, she would not part with him. Then, one recent morning at breakfast, Ditty got jam on him. That settled it. The new governess decided that the bear must go. Joan decided that Pooh should be reupholstered while they were at Palm Springs.

"I came back from Palm Springs, and found the reupholstered Pooh waiting," Joan told me. "But he wasn't Pooh any more. He was a hideous plush animal. I told the governess to hide him, intending to do something about him later. She gave him to Homer, our chauffeur, for his little boy. I was sick when I discovered that Pooh was gone. I couldn't ask Homer's little boy to give him back, and I couldn't give Ditty a bear that wasn't a twin of Pooh. It would destroy her faith in me, in all adults. It was an important issue. I told the household to ransack the town for another bear, just like Pooh. They couldn't find one. Pooh, it seems, was a very special, imported bear. What they did bring back was a cheap, ratty thing; there wasn't the slightest family resemblance to Pooh.

"Then I remembered that five years ago, when I had broken my hip, someone had given me a teddy bear exactly like Pooh. I had stored it away in a box in the basement, along with other keepsakes. I rummaged, found it, gave it to Ditty. She thinks it's Pooh, she still has her faith in grown-ups, and we have a teddy bear that has been in the family which makes it much nicer than any other bear could be."

(A small incident, perhaps, but it says volumes about Joan Bennett.)

So she's a keeper of keepsakes? "Yes—a very sentimental creature. I treasure old pieces of hair, baby shoes, caps and things I've made for the children. I have a trunkful of things. I have every letter and telegram that my husband has ever sent me. The day after we met, I received the first one, along with some flowers. 'Dear Miss Bennett,' he wrote, 'I hope that when you are getting better, you will allow me to call.' I don't regret having broken my hip. I'm a convert to the philosophy that everything happens for a reason."

Joan admits that she is "a very particular person." She worries, too. "If I haven't anything to worry about, I'll find something, And the worst part is that I conceal most of my worry. I'm an introvert, keep things too much to myself, live too much within myself. I'm trying to get over it. I admire people who aren't introverts. In fact, I envy them. Why should I worry? I shouldn't. Just habit. Probably from having responsibilities so young, being on my own at eighteen."

She also has one phobia. Claustrophobia, the fear of enclosed spaces. "I get it when there are three in the seat of a car, when I am in crowds. I've ridden in the New York subway only once, for that reason."

She plans the daily menus for the Markey household, which is usually in a genially upset state. She complains that this distresses her. Her husband tells her, "You're never happy unless there's confusion, so don't complain. Be happy."

Gene has recently become a producer at 20th Century-Fox. "I tell him that the world's laziest man will have to work now. Executives have office hours. Seriously, I'm thrilled about his new work."

His favorite heroine's name, long before he ever met her, was Joan. Today, when he writes a story or a scenario, the heroine is usually Joan in disguise. Right now, he is writing a comedy about Lucrezia Borgia, famous Italian beauty of the 16th Century, whose lovers had a habit of getting themselves poisoned. Joan's suppressed desire is to play Lucrezia—Lucrezia as Gene is painting the lady. Another suppressed desire is to play Marie Antoinette, also in caricature. "Fickle ladies of passion have been taken seriously too long," Joan believes. "It's time there was a fresh slant on the ladies—a bit of lampooning."

She has no worries about the advent of color in films. She has passed her color-camera tests. As for her own preferences in colors, they are periwinkle and bright green. Star sapphires (she says, with a smile) are her favorite jewels.

She enjoyed her change of pace, and change of type, as the fast-talking manicurist of "Big Brown Eyes." She looks forward to a future full of varied roles.

Joan told me that she had "eighty thousand fittings" to go through for "Two in a Crowd." I asked her if exaggeration was one of her sins.

"Only about clothes fittings," she told me, with a smile over her shoulder, just before stepping out of the restaurant to her car, through a lane of autograph-collectors—all poised to capture the elusive Joan Bennett, who is the littlest, yet the biggest, of the Bennetts, an actress with vision, not even partially blind.

corner of the garden, which occupied two huge stages. A glistening pool in the center reflected the exquisite blossoms of the trees and shrubbery which surrounded it. Live olive trees added to the authenticity and their slim branches cast faint shadows on the blue sky beyond, making a charming background for the picture.

When Lord and Lady Cavendish were being shown this set, he reached out with his foot to touch what he thought was glass.

"One would think there was water in the pool, it looks so realistic," he said.

The shock of discovering it was really water caused him to lose his balance and he went tumbling in.

Incidentally, Shakespeare never mentioned a balcony in his play. He spoke of a window and the imagination of the set dresser for the first production of the play furnished the balcony. Since then there has always been one. Today the best-remembered part of "Romeo and Juliet" and, to a great many people, the most important scenes, are the ones played on the balcony. Doubtless the audience would cry that Shakespeare had been rewritten if the picture were made without it.

A CLOSE inspection of the corner stones leading up to it worried me. After all, Leslie Howard is no Douglas Fairbanks and I feared he would never get up there. Suppose he got half way up and couldn't proceed in either direction! Suppose they had to rewrite the scene. And then I heard gossip to the effect that an escalator was being installed because, if Romeo didn't get up to the balcony, there couldn't be a picture. But all my worry was for nothing because Edna May Oliver came to the rescue, like the good sport she is, and threw Romeo a rope ladder.

Of course, there was a stairway in the back for Juliet but that is because she is an M-G-M star. Romeo is just a free lance player and had to do the best he could. They always make it easier for the contract players. Later I saw Leslie Howard on the balcony, so when you see the picture you will know it is really Romeo and not a double. If I had seen him scale the wall to get into the garden I shouldn't have worried about his ability to climb up to the balcony for, despite his slight appearance, he is quite an athlete.

He proved to be quite a sprinter, too, and became so adept at disappearing that, along with the musical score you may hear an undertone of "Romeo, Romeo, wherefore art thou, Romeo?" and a few queries not quite as polite, running all through the picture.

Miss Shearer was lovely in her sheer, white nightie, over which she modestly threw a long blue cape with a gold collar when she stepped out of bed, but despite the magic spell of her beauty, Romeo would wander off the set. In five minutes a dignified atmosphere would be transformed into utter confusion, with everyone constituted a special detective to find Romeo. Sometimes he would be discovered taking a little nap; sometimes visiting another set in search of talent for his New York production of "Hamlet" and more than once he was found taking a sun bath. His excursions to the rehearsal hall

No girl can be too sure of her daintiness to make this "Armhole Odor" Test

If the slightest dampness collects on the armhole of your dress, it will cling to the fabric, and the warmth of your body will bring out an embarrassing "armhole odor" each time you wear the dress . . .

IF you have been taking your daintiness for granted, because you deodorize regularly, you will be wise to make this simple "armhole odor" test. You may be unpleasantly surprised!

When you take off your dress tonight, smell it at the armhole. If you have ever perspired in that dress, even slightly, you will find that the fabric at the armhole bears an unmistakable and unlovely odor . . . in spite of your careful deodorizing! The way that dress smells to you—is the way you smell to others! And the warmth of your body brings out the offending "armhole odor" each time you put on the dress!

Complete protection only in underarm dryness

It is not enough to keep your underarm sweet. Only a dry underarm can keep you and your clothes safe from perspiration. When there is any moisture at all, it is bound to dry on the armhole of your dress and rob you of that perfect exquisiteness that is your goal.

Thousands of users discover with relief and delight that Liquid Odorono gives complete protection from "armhole odor," because it definitely keeps the underarm not only sweet but perfectly dry.

Your doctor will tell you that Odorono works safely and gently. It merely closes the pores of the small underarm area, so that perspiration is diverted to other less confined parts of the body where it may evaporate freely without giving offense.

Saves expensive frocks

Odorono is safe for your pretty frocks, too—no grease to make them sticky and messy. It will save you too-frequent cleaner's bills and the often permanent stains that follow underarm perspiration.

were not in vain for his eye fell on Mary Meyer, one of Juliet's lovely dancing girls, and he chose her to appear in his play as the stately queen.

Always he returned to his Juliet eventually, and one of the most incongruous sights on the set was our Romeo in his beruffled costume and long, blonde hair returning after one of these disappearances calmly smoking his huge pipe.

Even the poignant parting scene between the two lovers was not without an element of comedy. Daylight was breaking as they stood at the window and suddenly heard the notes of a bird outside. Juliet thought it was a nightingale.

"It was the lark," contradicted Romeo, apparently trying to start a quarrel. But at that moment a dove interrupted as peacemaker with a soothing "Coooooooooo."

A year ago the research department, under Natalie Bucknall, began its work of delving into the customs and habits of the 15th Century Italians. Prof. William Strunk, Jr., Shakespearian authority at Cornell, was brought to Hollywood to supervise their efforts, and an entire section of the department was set aside for books on the author and the period.

Among the facts uncovered was that Juliet is the first girl known to propose to a man. So if Leap Year has been of the slightest benefit to you, girls, you have Juliet to thank.

Also, according to Professor Strunk, Shakespeare was not the first person to write this famous love story. The inhabitants of Verona believe to this day that the two young people actually lived there and that the story is true. At least two other people wrote the story before Shakespeare did, but it is his version that became immortal and his dramatic genius that made the characters live to this day.

Cameramen were sent to Italy to photograph the crooked little streets, the castles and cathedrals, which are still standing, so that they could be copied for the picture. And a few months ago the residents of Culver City, accustomed as they are to anything, were surprised to see a tiny city springing up just outside the huge Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studio.

The entire City of Verona had to be constructed. For a time it was a delicate question whether to move the studio and build Verona on its 80 acres, or to leave the studio and build Verona elsewhere. Finally, 100 acres nearby were rented and there Verona stands, a miniature replica of the original.

It was in a scene showing the guests and gate crashers arriving at the party being given by the Capulets that I was told to work, and for my big scene I was placed aboard a nice, fat horse.

The Capulets, in case you don't remember, were Juliet's mamma and papa, and the party was in the nature of an announcement party in honor of Juliet's betrothal to Paris (Ralph Forbes).

BEING on a horse has its advantages, as well as its drawbacks, and I don't mean what you mean, either, for this horse was equipped with a side saddle that resembled a rocking chair. My seat was an excellent vantage point, but during the long waits between "takes," I was marooned on the horse while the other 1999 extras could go outside for ice cream cones, or stand around gossiping.

Being just a crasher I was not included in the crowd invited to the banquet table inside, which made it just like any Hollywood party. If you haven't a title, you aren't asked to the best places any more.

The scene outside the Capulet castle was a riot of color. Hundreds of extras and principals in gorgeously hued costumes, some of them wearing masks and head dresses resembling animals; some carrying torches, flags, weird heads atop ten-foot poles; dancers, dwarfs, all transformed the square into a hustling, bustling picture out of the past. Not even a Hollywood costume party could inspire a crowd to go to such lengths to achieve effects.

"It's amazing, the trouble involved in going to a party in the 15th Century," remarked Leslie Howard. "In those days they had trouble in getting to a party. Nowadays we have our troubles in getting home from a party."

The extras had been working on this scene for days and I marveled at the spontaneity they managed to inject into their shouts and laughter each time the scene was remade.

Barrymore, as Mercutio, and Reginald Denny, as Benvolio, were engaged in friendly argument at the top of the steps as the crowd approached. As Barrymore read his lines, Director George Cukor laughed, gesticulated and read the lines with him. Hundreds of eyes were on him, fascinated. He acts every scene with his actors; he repeats every line of dialogue; he feels every emotion as they feel it. Imagine him feeling some of Barrymore's emotions!

Between scenes, Barrymore in his tight-fitting, cream-colored leather coat with bright red figures on it and tight breeches, paced up and down the stage, his coat tails flapping with every step. He was making queer noises, but from where I sat I couldn't tell whether he was repeating his lines or whether he had eaten something that had disagreed with him.

He gave a magnificent performance. Shakespeare must have had him in mind when he wrote the play, for he once said: "I was obliged to kill Mercutio in the third act. He was stealing the show from Romeo."

THE scene was suddenly quieted as Norma Shearer made her appearance, followed by a fawn. It seems that ladies of quality in those days had odd pets. For weeks the fawn has followed her around until it was as well trained as any Hollywood animal actor. And like the other actors, it had fallen in love with Norma and refused to leave her side. Norma had been home ill for several days and was visiting the young deer to make sure, she said, that it didn't forget her.

"And you boys better stop fooling around, too," she called back as she left the set, "because Juliet is on the mend."

Anyone who is under the impression that the classics are too highbrow for popular enjoyment will be able to sympathize with Andy Devine. When asked if he had ever played Shakespeare before, he replied: "I haven't even read Shakespeare."

He made a test for the role of Peter, a sort of man Friday to Edna May Oliver, was chosen for the part, and then couldn't be found.

"Where have you been hiding?" they asked him when he finally made his appearance.

"I wasn't hiding," he told them. "I was out roping calves.

"I feel out of place here," he told me. "Everything is so dignified. It's like being in a foreign country."

But at that moment Edna May Oliver, her long, voluminous skirts hoisted high above her knees, came racing through the crowded stage pursued by John Barrymore, who was shrieking with glee. And right away Andy began to feel at home.

Ordinarily Miss Oliver knits between scenes, but if Barrymore is around she keeps well out of the way. He takes a fiendish delight in unraveling her knitting and teasing her.

Walking down the street in one scene, Miss Oliver and Andy pass a house where a group of courtesans are seated on a balcony. To show her contempt, Miss Oliver spat in their direction, but being a lady and no expert in the art of spitting, she fell short of her mark and spat directly in Andy's face. Time and again they made the scene, but her marksmanship failed to improve and each time poor Andy was on the receiving end of her efforts. After three days Director Cukor decided to leave the scene in.

Reginald Denny brought some of his toy airplanes to the set but Norma promptly took them home to Irving, Jr., "For the good of the picture," she explained.

Then Denny and Basil Rathbone followed Leslie Howard's example and brought small moving picture cameras on the set but Mr. Cukor decided that three cameras besides the ones making the picture were too many and banished them.

Besides Professor Strunk, Professor John Tucker Murray, Harvard University authority on the Elizabethan stage, was at the studio for months helping to prepare this huge production.

"They are the chaperones," Norma explained. "They have to keep Shakespeare out of the Brown Derby. But seriously," she added, "they have left no stone unturned to assist in bringing Shakespeare to the screen with the utmost fidelity to the author's conception of the play. Not a word of the manuscript has been changed. Not a line has been added.

"How Juliet is portrayed has always been a matter of individual interpretation, and I feel I will escape comparisons with the great actresses who have played the part because the screen is so different from the stage. I'm so happy to have had the opportunity."

She looked radiantly happy. Everyone in the picture is happy to have had a part in it. Even the mechanics on the picture have become Shakespeare conscious. Do you know what I did when I got off that horse? I hurried home and read again, "Romeo and Juliet."

He Lives His Impulses

of unhappy times. I've been moody, depressed. And those phases 'learned me' that planning gets me nowhere, that a system strangles me and that trying to conform to conventional patterns makes a bull in a china shop out of me. When I'm a square peg in a round hole I don't seem able to take it lying down.

"The only time I don't give way to my impulses—when I can help it—is when I'm mad. That's the time to put the stop-watch on yourself and wait until the old blood pressure is normal again before you make a move in any direction. When I get fighting mad I try to sit tight until I can see black and white again, as well as red. Like one time a certain man in town did something that ate me up. I went home in a towering rage, sat down and wrote him a blistering letter. Then I didn't mail it. I don't remember why I didn't but the next day I saw the whole thing differently. And since that time this man and I have become pretty good friends. If I had obeyed that impulse I would have lost a very pleasant, and as it turned out, a very profitable contact.

"And I don't think," Clark said, more gravely now, "that I'll live on impulse when, if ever, I marry again. Right now I'd say that I never will because I might meet some girl and marry her within a month, but I don't think so. If ever I marry again, I want to be sure that I know all about the girl—I want to know her for a couple of years—find out how she thinks and what she wants out of life, everything about her. It's all right for a very young chap to fall head over heels. But an older man, a man who has been married, is a fool if he hasn't learned to walk more carefully, to take more time, to test his own emotions.

"So I should say that 'in anger' and 'in love' are the only times when I wouldn't live on impulse—or shouldn't.

BUT I'm talking out of turn. I'm not interested in the idea of marriage. I'm not interested in rules and regulations, schedules, obligations, bonds of any kind. I've said before that freedom is what I want now and I still say it.

"I should have taken a lesson from my earlier life. Time was when I was working in a rubber factory in Akron, Ohio, and studying medicine at night school. Planning to be an M.D. I didn't like the rubber factory and I didn't like medicine. But I had been brought up to believe that a young man should prepare himself for a definite profession, preferably by working his way through—whether he liked it or not. That didn't matter. It seems to be a part of the American tradition that it's worthy not to get any fun out of your work. I don't believe it. Getting a kick out of life, and especially out of what you do nine hours out of ten, is as good a religion as any I know. It's stupid to be unhappy.

"Anyway, one night after medical school, I was eating a hamburger at an all-night stand. Two young fellows were in there, talking theatre. They were actors with a stock company playing in town. Something of the enthusiasm in their voices struck me. I went to see their show. And I tossed a coin on the spot—heads for doctoring—tails for acting. The tails got it and I never went back to the medical."

When you are with Clark you get the sense of living as a robust, full-bodied thing—real and worth living. You feel comfortable with him. And I thought again, what I've thought and said many times before, I like Clark Gable—and so would you. I may add that this is not true of everyone in Hollywood, not by any manner of means. Naming no names, I will say that there are quite a few I can think of who would not be endured if it were not for the aura of name and fame.

Clark really never changes. He is just as warm and hearty and unspoiled as he was when I first talked with him, five years ago or so. He even looks comfortable, Clark does. There is something generous and heartening about his expansive smile, his deep laughing eyes, his dimples which are more clefts than dimples. He never looks too "well-groomed." He was wearing, that day, a gray flannel suit, tan shirt and dark tie. His clothes always look as though he had worn them for some time. His hair never looks as though it had just been barbered. His very hand clasp is hearty, cordial and enveloping. He walks with a spring to his step as though he were going somewhere and was eager to get there.

HE was saying, "And so, I live on my impulses now with a free mind. I go fishing and hunting when I want to, alone sometimes, sometimes with one of the stage hands of one of the boys at the studio who likes fishing, too.

"I do all the little things I feel like doing. I shine my own boots. My valet—I have one here at the studio only because I have to, to keep my clothes pressed and cleaned—sits around sunning himself outside my dressing-room door most of the time. And when we leave the studio at night, I go home—and so does he, I guess.

"During the noon hour, when I'm working, sometimes I dash over to a nearby gun club and do some skeet shooting. Sometimes I go to the rifle range, on the back lot of the studio, and shoot it up with some of the boys.

"When I go on my hunting trips I never go to swank resorts or preserves. I know what that means. You meet someone you know and the first thing you're in the soup and fish making polite conversation in a lodge dining-room. I do my hunting off the beaten trails. I usually go to the same place, don't ask me where. I always visit the same people there, too. They live in rude cabins and I eat my meals with them. We sit around the fire half the nights through swapping stories. They don't know who I am or where I come from. They don't know my name. They don't care. That's swell with me.

"I tinker with my own car instead of sending it to a garage. I get up very early in the morning or very late. When I'm working, of course, I have to be up about six. But when I'm not working I have no daily schedule of any sort. I keep no 'engagement book.' One day I think it might be well to run down to the Santa Anita race track and see if my horse, Beverly Hills, has—hah!—won any more ribbons! The next day I may decide to do some skeet shooting. Or I may stick around and polish my guns. Or I may take a postman's holiday and drop by the studio to see if anything has happened. I live for the day, the hour, almost the half-hour, and I'm no worse off than I've ever been in my life before.

"I don't do 'the thing to do' any more, either. Once someone suggested to me that I should play polo—gentleman's game and all that. So I bought myself a polo outfit and a polo pony and went to it. In about two weeks I gave it up. Not, as reports had it, because the studio ordered me to. But because I was a dub at it. I felt like a fool—a great hulk like me riding one of those graceful little horses.

NO harm in trying anything once, of course. But if what I try doesn't gee with me I don't do what I once felt I had to do—stick at it. I chuck it into the discard and forget it. And try something else.

"It's silly to be too persistent about everything. It's silly to be pigeon-holed when you know dam' well you don't belong. It's foolish to woo success too hard—if you do, it slips out on you.

"I always want the things I haven't got, I hope I always will. That's what keeps the impulses growing. And a man without impulses is dead and doesn't know it.

"So now I flip coins in dead earnest. Why not? It was a flip of the coin that decided me not to take a bit part in 'What Price Glory?' a few years ago. Later, I was offered a good part in the second unit of the same show. And the second unit turned out to be the first, really, and we played Los Angeles instead of being sent on the road.

"Another flip of a coin actually brought me to Hollywood. I'd had some luck and recognition starring in 'Machinal' and a couple of other plays in New York. A producer from the Coast wired me asking me to come to Los Angeles to play the lead in 'The Last Mile.' I didn't know what to do. Broadway came first with me then, as it did with most actors. I wasn't especially broke at the moment so that the added money was no great inducement. What to do—hang around Broadway and take a chance on another show or go to Los Angeles and take the sure part and the extra dough? I flipped a coin—heads Los Angeles—tails New York. Heads turned up. I came West. I'm still here.

"I even live on my impulses so far as my work is concerned. Not that it gets me very far. I haven't much to say about what I do or do not do, where stories are concerned. But I still have the impulse to argue about it, to put up a fight when I don't like a part. I'm not any too keen about a picture on the grid for me now. I'd have to play an Englishman. And I'm not an Englishman. I'm a plain American and nothing else but. Can you imagine me talking with an English accent? You bet you can't. Neither can I. I'd sound foolish to myself and to you and to everyone else. If I do play it I'll just talk like I always do. I'll be myself or nothing.

"And I didn't, by the way, have an impulse to take out a fighting license as was reported. I'd know better. Why, if I got up against Maxie Baer he'd knock the ears off of me in five seconds!

"And now," said Clark, "my time's up—the fish in Utah are running and they're my game. I'll be seein' you."

And he was gone. Out of the dining-room, with that quick tread of the man who has places to go and wants to get there.

Midsummer Fashion Viewpoint

And to show me how she works pink into the picture, Jeanette dragged a printed chiffon dinner dress out of the closet. You can see it on page 56. It's a royal blue chiffon printed all over with widely spaced garlands of flowers in cornflower blue, pink and coral, the last color named being the most prominent in the design. This is a grand dress for dining and dancing on hot evenings and it will go right into early September without looking too summery. That softly shirred fullness of the bodice is very flattering and so is the ruffled collar. With this dress she wears a rhinestone bracelet and brooch with matching clips in her hair which is quite a fling for her because she wears practically no jewelry as a rule. She says that her few pieces of jewelry include the star sapphire, mentioned before, a gold key pin and a clip or two. She usually feels quite reckless when she buys a piece of costume jewelry!

JEANETTE admits that she is almost the only star in Hollywood who doesn't own a single tailored suit! She doesn't like them for herself and has never worn one. She much prefers a more feminine type of daytime costume. The tailored but feminine brown dress on page 57 gives you an idea of her substitute for the great Hollywood uniform. It's really a one-piece affair but the pleated peplum gives it a two-piece effect. The collar and tiny jabot are made of tabs

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE—WITHOUT CALOMEL

And You'll Jump out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

THE liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile onto the food you swallow every day. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

A mere movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up". Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. Stubbornly refuse anything else. 25c at all drug stores. © 1935, C. M. CO.

Something very new in toppers! Doris Nolan wears the fetching Kahula Lotus beach hat which ties under her chin.

of the material. The shoulders are slightly peaked and padded to give width and the smartly designed belt is brown patent leather. Jeanette singled this particular dress out as one of those perfect dresses you should have in your wardrobe—worn during the cooler days of midsummer, it goes right into fall, with the result that you always have a seasonable dress to wear.

The tiny brown hat, that goes with this dress, is trimmed with a huge pom-pom of calico. Jeanette likes small hats best. She will hunt days for a hat she likes and won't buy one until she's sure it's exactly what she wants.

She likes tailored nightgowns and robes—you know the type, those lovely hand-made gowns with nothing but fine drawn work or a bit of embroidery. And her robes are as plain as a man's flannel one. Her mother remarked that she goes quite haywire every now and then, buying a very frothy negligee which she never wears—evidently likes to look at them hanging in the closet!

Her special hobbies are bands, bags and hankies. And what kind of bands, you ask? Not rubber ones! But those miniature bands of all kinds, tiny replicas of German brass bands, bunny bands, mice bands—just anything little and musical which she dotes on having around on tables in the house. She has handbags in every size, shape and color, two or three for each costume, in fact. And she is crazy about fine, hand-made white handkerchiefs.

Did you know that she probably has the smallest feet in Hollywood? And her hands are small and delicate, too. She has difficulty finding gloves to fit her.

Beside her yen for pink and red, she likes blue and green. One of her pet dresses this summer is a turquoise blue mousseline de soie. It has a gay nineties look with its diaphanous leg o' mutton sleeves and a high gathered bodice. Beneath the dress rustles a slip of taffeta, the top and hem edged with lace which shows through the filmy mousseline. She calls this her "rebel" dress because she wore it to one of the famous Mayfair parties this summer when everyone had been requested to come in prints!

One of Jeanette's friends told me an interesting thing about her and it's something we can absorb, too. She said that, although clothes are very important to Miss MacD., they never reach such importance that she is conscious of them and her appearance all the time. She said that Jeanette could walk into a party, find others more formally dressed than herself, and not let it spoil her good time in any way. She always feels that she can compete with any group, provided she knows that what she is wearing suits her and is in good taste, regardless of whether it is as elaborate and as formal as the clothes the other women may be wearing. That's a grand attitude to adopt about your own clothes—far too many girls let an evening be ruined because they don't think that their dresses compare favorably with others. Feeling sure of yourself is half of looking smart.

ANOTHER Hollywood-ite that I enjoy talking to about clothes is Madge Evans. Like Jeanette, she has sound and conservative ideas that can be passed on to all of you. And the way she solves the midsummer clothes problem is a revelation. She doesn't believe that it's smart to start buying fall hats and dresses the first of August. Instead, she thinks it's far smarter to wait for the first giddy fashion fancies to pass out of the picture and select the clothes that are destined to last through the new season. So, in order to pep up her summer wardrobe and not feel that midsummer let-down, she has various dodges which she uses to advantage.

Madge (who is making "Piccadilly Jim" with Bob Montgomery) is one of the biggest blue fans I have ever known. It is her favorite color and so she wears it year in and year out. You'd think her clothes would seem monotonous as a result but they never do because she is so clever about the interesting variations she achieves with this one basic color. Talking about cool-looking clothes for the dog days, Madge said she couldn't imagine a cooler costume combination than navy blue with crisp touches of white. So just in case I was dubious, she offered to show me what she is wearing right now.

As topper to a finely pleated navy blue chiffon skirt, she wears a white vest and fingertip length jacket. The vest is sleeveless and has a small turnover collar edged with scallops of the material. The jacket has wide lapels and flap pockets, also edged in the scallops. Both of these are of washable pique, crisp and fresh on the hottest day. As you can see, Madge wears a wide-brimmed, daisy-trimmed navy blue hat and navy accessories.

Another day, in place of the pique jacket and vest, she will wear a printed linen tunic over this same skirt. In fact, various jackets and blouses, enable her to have several complete costumes with just this one skirt as the base.

A dark crepe dress with which she wears light summer hats now, will gracefully bridge the jump from summer to fall later on. This is the smart navy blue silk on page 58. Two-piece, the blouse has an unusual tucked treatment on the bodice and across the shoulders of the short sleeves.

The close-up on the same page shows Madge's good-looking accessories in detail. A wide-brimmed sailor of natural colored straw has a shallow crown circled by navy ribbon. Streamers are drawn through the brim at back and lend a fetching "little girl" air to the hat—a cluster of field flowers and roses at front. Aren't those blue kid gloves stunning with the white stitching stripes and the perforated trimming? Madge gives herself a last look in the small mirror from her large navy kid envelope bag.

When the air gets a fall nip to it, Madge will wear furs with this dress and change her straw hat for a felt or velvet one. And that's what you can do, too, and you'll never have that in-between season feeling of having nothing in your closet fit to wear!

As you kow I am always on the search for anything new in fashion which I can pass on to you. Since hot weather is the time when you want to keep your costumes fresher than ever, I thought you'd like to hear about a new dress shield that is the last word in thinness and yet it has tremendous durability.

The proud maker of this shield describes it thus, "so thin you won't know they're in." And it's true, they're sheer and cool, practically without any bulk when fastened in your dress. They are made of a one-piece seamless rubber product and will withstand both boiling and ironing, never losing shape.

If you would like to know the name of this shield and where to buy it, just write in to me and I shall be glad to forward the information. Dress shields are indispensable to the smart grooming of Hollywood stars and I am sure they must be to you, too.

New Styles in Parents

theirs. There is no business or pleasure that can't be interrupted long enough for Bing to get to a telephone and call his home before time for the children to be put to bed, if he can't get there in person.

"Did the kids miss me today?" he asks eagerly. "What did Gary say about me?" And since Gary is old enough to talk, he is often allowed to speak to his daddy and deliver his own message, just as thousands of other little boys are breaking the monotony of business for their fathers.

They are just everyday folk, these Crosbys. Before the twins were born, and long before the doctor had announced that two babies might be expected, there was the usual family argument over a name for the new baby. If it was to be a boy, Dixie's heart was set on naming him Dennis. Bing was equally determined to call him Philip.

"How about Dennis Philip?" suggested Dixie.

"Maybe Philip Dennis," Bing insisted.

What promised to be a lasting argument was only settled when the stork, showing rare presence of mind, furnished a boy for each name and they were promptly christened Dennis and Philip.

Now it's "my boy, Dennis, walked first," from Dixie, and "my son, Philip, talked first," from Bing.

With all this parental affection and attention, however, the Crosby children are not "spoiled." You'll never hear one of them beating a tattoo on his plate and yelling, "I don't want any spinach!" Because, whether it's spinach or ice cream that is set before them, they eat it and say nothing. Their meals come at regular hours and they are never given food between meals.

ONE day their Uncle Larry came in from playing golf and went to the kitchen to make himself a sandwich. The three little Crosbys followed him and stood looking hungrily at every mouthful he ate. Without thinking he gave each one of them a graham cracker. At that moment Dixie arrived on the scene. She took the crackers away from the children and gave them a scolding.

Larry took the blame but Dixie said, "It makes no difference. They know they aren't allowed to eat between meals." Dixie knows the value of routine, and her children have been taught to do everything by the clock. They go to sleep at a certain time and awake in the morning at a certain time. Noises never bother them. Not even a party in the house nor enthusiastic crooning by Papa Bing, for the entertainment of his guests, will awaken the babies once they are asleep.

With two sets of adoring grandparents living close by, it has been necessary to avoid complications by arranging the visits of the children to them in routine. Each child visits the home of each grandparent once each week. The twins make their visits together, but Gary, a little older and enjoying a different type of entertainment, goes alone. Everyone is satisfied.

One morning recently, Philip, the livelier of the twins, slipped into his mother's bedroom, helped himself to a jar of cold cream and two bottles of perfume. First he rubbed the cream on his face and then made a neat spread of it on the cream-colored carpet. On top of that he poured the perfume which made a grand smell and, by the time the nurse arrived, things were in a fine state. Philip was soundly spanked. Spare the rod and spoil the child is one rule that Bing and Dixie don't believe in.

They are allowed but a few toys at one time, as their parents believe that having too many toys discourages initiative in the children.

The children aren't taken to the studio and paraded around. They don't hang around "watching daddy work." I learned that Gary had been allowed to visit the studio just once when there was a circus set so he could see the clowns and animals. There will be no Crosby children in the movies—that is not as child actors. If they develop into actors later, that will be a different matter.

At the ranch, where life is lived as simply as possible, the children sleep in a huge dormitory, but in the new Crosby home near Toluca Lake, Gary has a room of his own. The twins share a very large bedroom but each has his own clothes closet and their bathroom is equipped with two of everything!

"They will have everything they need, but outside of that—nothing doing," is the way Bing expresses it. "I had six brothers and sisters. My father provided the necessities for us, but for extras we had to hustle. That's the way it will be with my boys. They aren't going to have fancy allowances just because I've been lucky and made some money. I've provided their college money. They each have an annuity, which will come due when they are seventeen. They can take the money and go to college, or if they want to work a while and go to school later they may. But their education is paid for—now.

"I'm not going to dictate their futures," he continued. "I'm not going to tell them that they have to be doctors or lawyers. They have to decide that for themselves."

But naturally, Bing would be pleased if any or all of them turned out to be musically inclined. Gary has a deep, husky voice that sounds exactly like his famous dad's, and sings all the time. The twins, not yet two years old, can carry a tune.

They are natural and amusing children. Gary heard Bing call Andy Devine "Blimp" and quickly figured out the implication. The matter was forgotten until one day Norman Taurog, who also is built generously, called at the house and was greeted by Gary, who called out in a friendly way: "Hello, Blimp!"

BING is one Hollywood star who has never been troubled with "fame" sickness, a disease particularly prevalent in Hollywood. His greatest extravagance is his string of race horses which, with luck, might become a source of income. He refuses to regard them on a commercial basis, however, and the Crosby horses never run unless their owner is there to see them. His breeding stables at his ranch are perfectly equipped. When it was necessary to cut down hundreds of trees to clear acreage on which to raise alfalfa for the ponies, Bing helped "for exercise."

His money has been invested in good, solid bonds and securities. One brother, Everett, manages his motion picture contracts, and another brother, Larry, manages his radio business. They, with Bing's father and Bing, of course, form Crosby, Inc. A suite of offices at the Paramount Studio is their headquarters.

Everett and Larry occupy small offices separated by a large office, which is occupied by Mr. Crosby Senior and two secretaries. There must be a reason why Bing, at the end of five years has seventy fan clubs and hires one girl to do nothing but answer his fan mail.

A delightful air of informality is introduced when Everett, from his office, yells: "Pappy! How many rooms are there in Bing's new house?"

"He isn't here," yells a secretary back, "but Larry says there are twenty rooms, seven baths and five fireplaces."

"Pappy!" yells Larry from his office. "What is the name of that man I'm to see?"

When "Pappy" returns to his desk, he is confronted with the problems of the past ten minutes.

"The man's name is Carroll," he yelled at Larry, "and there are twenty-two rooms in Bing's house," he yelled at Everett, after which business went on as usual.

For a long time Bing and Dixie have planned a vacation together.

"I've worked since I was a kid," Bing said. "Dixie and I want to take a trip. We want to go around the world. Not as movie stars, but just as a couple of people. We've been looking forward to it for a long time."

But the longest trip in sight right now is to Vancouver, B.C., this summer, where Bing has been invited to be a guest of honor at the Golden Jubilee. He plans to take his brother Larry and his wife, and may take his string of ponies up to show the Canadians how they can run.

Jean Harlow Is Watching Her Step

were blending into one gentle and closely-knit personality.

For Jean always has been a marked case of a "split personality." What people who do not know her, think she is like and what her close friends know she is like, are as far apart as the poles.

WE talk books when I visit with Jean. We talk politics. We discuss people and problems with passion and intensity. We drink coffee and philosophize. It may not be very profound philosophy, I wouldn't know. But at least our conversation is not dotted with gossip of parties and pettiness. I first became interested in Soviet Russia when, a couple of years ago, Jean loaned me "Stalin, The Career of a Fanatic."

She is intelligent. She has a sound brain, an honest heart and a grand sense of humor. Now she is engaged in the process of stripping off the publicized Jean as, long ago, she stripped off the exotic gowns and make-up; as she has shed the platinum hair and the extravagant house. The real Jean Harlow is emerging into focus through many mists, most of them manufactured by expert myth-makers.

I said to Jean, who was wearing a play suit of pale blue sharkskin, a blue ribbon tied 'round her hair, "You've changed—more."

"I know it," said Jean. "No one knows it better than I. You know, 'peace' is a very much misused word, but it is what I feel. It is what is happening to me. I feel a peace within which seems to grow deeper and stronger and surer every day.

"After all, I'm a quarter of a century old now, you know. I'm twenty-five as against the seventeen I was when I started in pictures, when I made 'Hells Angels' and began my career of florid publicity. I don't know whether I regret getting off on that rather feverish foot, so to speak, or not. It probably helped me, professionally. It made for a quicker start, attracted attention swiftly. It doubtless hurt me, personally. It's something that has to be lived down, something that can be discarded only with time.

"It's impossible to say, now, how things would have worked out for me had I begun in a different type of part and with a different brand of publicity. It's difficult to bridge—this difference between my screen personality and me.

"When I was very young, at the age of sixteen—even after I was first married, for the matter of that—I never had been allowed to wear a backless gown nor allowed to use mascara or lipstick. And so, when I first came to Hollywood, I wanted to do all these things. I used to buy the most exotic gowns I could find. I used to daub eye-shadow under my eyes and lipstick all over my mouth and try to get out of the house before mother could see me to drag me back, bodily.

"But I would have done the same thing whether I had been in pictures or not. It is a phase most young girls go through and outgrow.

I THINK," said Jean, pouring coffee for both of us, "that the change in me is really a matter of the simple, biological process called 'growing up.' After all, I am not a child any longer and I think I really realized it, for the first time this past year."

I think she has, too. For Jean is watching her step. She knows, now where she is going. She was plunged into public life when she was very young. And things happened to her, fast and furiously and without any volition of her own. Everything catapulted on her—headline things, happy and unhappy things.

I think, the difference in Jean is that she has control of her life, she knows where she wants to go and how to get there.

"I don't want anything more to happen to me," Jean was saying, her voice grave. "I don't want any more new experiences. Apart from my work, I want to do nothing at all but sit in the sun at home and rest and think."

And here is another drastic change in Jean's life—her mother is sitting back and letting her handle everything. And this is, Jean says, one of the most intelligent of the many things her mother has done for her.

"Now," said Jean, "when I have a decision to make, a problem to work out—whether it is personal, professional or financial—I cannot even discuss it with mother. Only when I have reached my own decision can I talk it over with her.

SKIN SMOOTH INSTANTLY—WITH POND'S VANISHING CREAM

POWDER LOOKS SWELL—NICE AND EVEN

NOSE AND CHIN GET Flaky?

Melt* Rough Places Smooth

ONE DAY your nose is flaky—powder won't "stick"! Next day, your chin . . . Often, after a day in the sun, your whole face scuffs up with flaky bits.

Do you know what they are?—Dead skin cells!

They cling stubbornly, show up terribly—even under make-up.

But you can melt them away easily—with a keratolytic cream (Vanishing Cream). A distinguished dermatologist explains:

Young Skin Appears

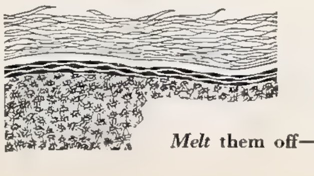
"When the dried-out cells on surface skin are melted away with a keratolytic cream (Vanishing Cream), the underlying cells come into view. These cells are young and supple. They immediately give the skin a smooth, fresh appearance. Coloring is improved, texture finer.

"Vanishing Cream, regularly applied, keeps the skin in a constantly softened condition."

A keratolytic cream, Pond's Vanishing Cream smooths your skin just that quickly! It melts flaky particles right away. Puts an end to powder trouble. Use it regularly to keep your skin silken-soft at all times.

For a smooth make-up—Before powdering, soften your skin with Pond's Vanishing Cream. Now your skin is smooth all over—even your nose and chin. Make-up spreads evenly, clings.

Overnight for lasting softness—Follow your nightly cleansing with Pond's Vanishing Cream. Face, neck, hands, elbows. It isn't greasy. You go to bed looking lovely . . . Next morning your skin has won extra softness!



Outer Skin
(magnified) At top you see surface cells dried out into flaky bits that feel rough, "catch" powder. Melt them off—for smoothness!

"You know, if my mother were a perfect stranger to me, no relation whatsoever, I would insist on having her live with me. She tells me," said Jean, her smile tender, "that the time must come inevitably, when she will not be here to advise me and that I must prepare for that day.

"And so, I am on my own for the first time in my life. I must take the consequences now of everything I do because there will be no one but me involved."

And in Jean's personal affairs the same neutrality is scrupulously observed. Jean and Bill Powell have been going together for more than two years now. There are all sorts of rumors about a secret marriage, an engagement, and even a break-up. They say nothing. But there are some things which are clear and obvious without the medium of words. I could swear to one thing—that Jean loves Bill and that Bill loves Jean. And that this love has made her the more serious, more thoughtful girl she has become—and a happier one.

I believe that she feels she has something concrete and substantial to depend upon. Something that gives her confidence in herself.

I know that her love for Bill is a strong and complete love. She actually doesn't know that other men exist. She doesn't see other men. Jean, as a matter of fact, has never been attracted easily to men. Despite the columns which have overflowed with Jean Harlow and her latest beaux. Not that the beaux wouldn't gladly, eagerly come a-beauing—but rather that Jean has gone, always, with just one man, sincere in her friendship, whole-souled in her love.

Sumptuous, sexy, seductive she may be on the screen—off the screen she is cool, intelligent, tender and loyal but less "sexy"—horrid word, but I have to use it to make my point clear—than almost any girl I know.

And the reason that Jean doesn't speak of marriage is that she is a one-track person. She doesn't believe that she can combine the two careers successfully, marriage and movies. She doesn't want to try. If she married Bill she would give up her career. And she doesn't want to do that until she has won complete independence, financially and in terms of success.

"And so," Jean was saying, "I shall go on with my work and I'll work hard. I'd like to do comedy, you know. But I seem to have been taken out of that. And I haven't much to say about what I do in the studio. I want to keep on making pictures, of course, for as long as my pictures are good enough for people to want.

"And most of all I want to rest—and be quiet—and to keep on finding the peace I have begun, for the first time, to know. . . ."

Well, Henry was a minute late, worse, he was three minutes late by all the clocks he passed, and the consequence was that by the time he reached the star's bedside he was perspiring with panicky fear that Farnum would miss the train. So distressed was Henry that he literally ran around in circles doing everything backwards. It amused Bill who was used to these antics and knew that they resulted from extreme conscientiousness and not from carelessness or indifference, but the minutes passed and action had to be taken.

As he stepped from the bath, Farnum said briskly, "A little speed now, Henry. It's getting late." That unfortunate sentence erased what little composure poor Henry had left. "Yes, sir," he said, breathing hard and, rushing toward the bedroom, returned with his boss's high silk hat and cane! Farnum didn't bat an eyelid but put the hat on his head and the cane over his arm, otherwise clothed au naturel. Striking an attitude, he said, "Now Henry, how do I look?" A dazed expression passed over Henry's face and then the mist cleared. He groaned in anguish and, staggering backwards, fell flat into the bathtub.

BILL could never demand anything quickly without throwing Henry into one of these panics. A simple request such as, "Henry, where are those shoes I wore yesterday?" spoken in a serious voice would bring the panicked expression into his eyes and start him fumbling first in his own pockets and then rushing hither and yon looking under rugs and even behind pictures, murmuring constantly, "Shoes! Shoes!" while Bill would walk to the closet and locate them himself.

But there were other times when Henry did not lose his head under tense situations and that was when he had anything to do that gave him an artistic expression for this tremendous emotion. Then he was himself, calm and more or less the master of the situation. Many of you may think that a motion picture actor, who was the idol of his day, could not possibly be anything but happy and gay, but Bill has had plenty of sorrow in his life, heartbreaking sorrow, and the thing that always helped him most was music. There were no radios then, this was in 1917-18, and when Bill was vacationing at Sag Harbor, he would sit at the piano and play for hours. Sometimes he would say, "Come on, Henry, let's give a concert," and Henry would at once lose the anxious look his face usually wore and quite a different expression would take its place. Leaning against the piano he would sing "O Solo Mio" and other arias all through an evening. He had a fine voice, untrained, but full, rich and vibrant and he sang, as so many Italians do, as though he loved it.

In almost every Farnum picture there was a part that Henry could play. Bill secured it for him at first, but as time went on, he didn't have to remind his director that Henry could do this part or that—he was automatically cast if there was a possible opening. Sometimes he had really important parts, usually a villain of some sort. He didn't provoke the laughter in those days that he does now. Story technique has changed and so has the style of acting. Then Henry's blood and thunder looks provided the audience with chills and terror, whereas today, if he had such a part, the audience would probably die laughing.

Then came the day that he fell in love and decided to be married. That period was something for the Farnum family to live through! For days Henry rushed about, breathing hard, making the most heroic efforts to be calm.

He invited everyone to the wedding but Bill was working and Mrs. Farnum could not go. The location was a picturesque little Catholic church in Corona, Long Island, and I may add that the roads out there were not at all what they are now. The hour was six in the evening and the time of year was winter. I've just forgotten the month but there was snow and ice almost everywhere you cared to look. I'll never forget the drive out there if I live to be a hundred, which God forbid!

To begin with, we were a little bit late as the car had been held up at the studio in Fort Lee, and I believe there was some question of the right road—anyhow we finally landed and I am not sure but what the ceremony had been held for a few minutes in the hope that Mr. Farnum would arrive. It was a sore blow to Henry that the Boss was not there to witness his marriage but with the natural courtesy of his race he was doubly gracious to me, the only representative of the family. I noticed, too, that the guests cast shy, furtive glances in my direction and I thought what a shame it was that Bill could not be there. It would have been the crowning touch of happiness to an ecstatic day in Henry's life.

It was a simple ceremony, with the soft candlelight playing over the happy faces of the bride and groom. She was clothed in white and carried a bouquet of lilies of the valley. Her hair was black, her eyes big and very dark, her skin was the magnolia white peculiar to the Latin races. Henry had picked an attractive girl.

A great many men owe their rise in life to the ambitions of their wives and Henry was no exception. Shortly after the wedding, Bill was on his way to Hollywood taking with him the usual entourage. The one addition was Mrs. Armetta who had left her home with mingled fear and curiosity. Curiosity to see a new locality and fear of loneliness in the separation from her family and friends. It is no fun for a young wife to sit at home alone all day and half of most every night waiting for the only person in the world she can talk with. Unable then to speak much English and finding practically no congenial companion for that reason, Mrs. Armetta fretted and wept in solitude. Also, looking about her, she saw no one she thought could act any better than her Henry, so why should he remain a valet when he could make so much more money as an actor?

ONCE that thought took fire in her mind Mrs. Armetta, goaded by loneliness and the fear that her child would be born in that desolate place, far away from the family whose care and companionship she would sorely need at such a time, unloaded the weight of her woe upon her husband every night. He, poor man, almost lost his reason. On one hand was his loyalty to his boss, on the other his loyalty to his wife. I wasn't in Hollywood at that time but the experience must have eben sumpin' for Bill. Repercussions of it even reached New York and finally, in the middle of a picture, Henry gave up his job. It probably was as much of a relief to Farnum as it was to Henry though he never would have said so. He sent them both back to New York with his blessing and a gift for the expected heir.

Work was slowing up in New York and Henry didn't have the smooth sailing everyone expected he would. I believe the next two years were rather slim and then the new Fox studio opened up on Tenth Avenue and Fifty-fifth Street to rather active business. Also, Henry's best

HAVE YOU A "SAHARA SKIN"?

IS IT DRY AND SCALY?

Here's a Face Cream that Lubricates as It Cleanses

By Lady Esther

Maybe you are a victim of dry skin? About 7 out of 10 women today are.

Dry skin is due to several things. One is the outdoor life we lead compared to our mothers' time. We spend more time in the open. Exposure to weather—to sun and wind—tend to take the natural oils out of the skin and make it dry and withered.

Our reducing diets, too, are a cause of dry skin. To keep slender, we leave fats out of our diets. This cuts down the oil supply of the skin and tends to make it dry.

A Dry Skin is an Old Skin

A dry skin is an old skin. It looks withered and wrinkled. It looks faded. A dry skin also fails to take make-up well. It makes powder show up plainly. It makes rouge look harsh and artificial.

If your skin is at all inclined to be dry it would be well for you to look into your cleansing methods. You must avoid anything that tends to dry the skin or irritate it. You must be sure to use gentle, soothing measures.

First, a Penetrating Cream

Lady Esther Face Cream is an excellent corrective of dry skin. For, as this cream cleanses the skin, it also lubricates it.

The first thing Lady Esther Face Cream does is to cleanse your skin thoroughly. It is a penetrating face cream. It actually penetrates the pores, but gently and soothingly.

Entering the pores, without rubbing, it goes to work on the imbedded waxy matter there. It loosens the hardened grime—dissolves it—and makes it easily removable. When you have cleansed your skin with Lady Esther Face Cream, you see it—you can feel it! Your skin instantly appears clearer and whiter. It feels clean—tingles with new life and freshness.

But, Lady Esther Face Cream also lubricates the skin. It resupplies it with a fine oil that overcomes dryness and keeps the skin velvety soft and smooth. This lubrication and freshening of the skin keeps it young-looking. It wards off lines and wrinkles. It gives it smoothness—permits it to take make-up better.

In every way you will improve the condition of your skin with the use of Lady Esther Face Cream. More than eight million women can testify to that.

See With Your Own Eyes Feel With Your Own Fingers!

Suppose you try Lady Esther Face Cream and see with your own eyes—and feel with your own fingers—what it will do for your skin.

I am perfectly willing that you make the test at my expense. Just send your name and address and by return mail you'll receive a 7-days' supply of Lady Esther Face Cream postpaid and free.

Use this cream as the directions tell you. Notice the dirt it gets out of your skin you never thought was there. Mark how the pores reduce themselves when relieved of their clogging burden.

Note, too, how delicately it lubricates your skin and how freshly soft and smooth it keeps it. A trial will prove convincing.

Mail the coupon today for your 7-days' supply of cream. With the cream I shall also send you all five shades of my Lady Esther Face Powder.

(You can paste this on a penny postcard.) (25) FREE

star must have been bright in midheaven for, shortly afterwards, J. Gordon Edwards, director-in-chief for Fox, went to Italy to make "The Shepherd King" and took Henry along as interpreter!

What a triumph for Mrs. Armetta, who knew he could do something fine if he only would try. What complete astonishment it caused in the studio. Mouths practically dropped open in amazement, for to be an interpreter was almost up to the first line trenches of big shots.

After that I lost track of Henry for a few years but, when I went to Hollywood again, he had bridged another lean period and was much in demand. Once more his star of success was bright and shining. The advent of talking pictures was also a step upward for him. His English was clear enough for the parts he played, as he always was cast as an Italian. If the part was humorous and he was required to speak quickly, the less he was understood, the funnier he was.

He began to creep into a place of importance in the minds of the directors and on the pay roll, too, Henry, today, undoubtedly makes more money than his former boss, although Bill, who for more than twenty years was the highest paid actor in the business, earning $10,000 a week straight salary during his last active year—big money any time—is still highly paid when he works, but that is not often. Illness and trouble made terrible inroads on his career, taking from him the will-to-accomplishment that had formerly been so potent a factor in his success. Today one seldom sees the name of William Farnum but the name of Henry Armetta is seen very often.

I feel different, being a movie star instead of a third-rate saxophone tooter, is that now I can pay my bills.

"Actor? I'm no actor! Never will be. I just get up there and do what they tell me to do, that's all. It's all I can do—just act natural, and be myself, and follow instructions. I'm glad the fans like it that way, and I hope they continue to like it, because if they don't, it's just gonna be too bad for me!"

All this is no pose with Fred MacMurray. Why, look at the guy—look at the way he lives, what he does for fun, who his friends are, where he goes for amusement. Look at these things, and you'll see he's still as unspoiled as he was before fame picked him out for the spotlight.

In the first place, there's no "gone-Hollywood" about his home life. Of course, he isn't in the really big money yet, but he's suddenly making a whacking salary. I've seen "sudden" stars go Hollywood on a lot less, but not Fred. He's still living in an obscure little apartment in the Hollywood hills, where his new wife keeps house for him. He has no servants.

HIS auto is an index, too. It's no chromium-plated foreign car. It's no glittery sports model, à la showcase. Instead, it's a 1933 coupe of a make that sells 'way under a thousand dollars when new. If Fred wants to turn it in some day on a new car, he'll be lucky if they allow him $175 on it! So far, though, he doesn't see why he should turn it in. It's done okay for him for three years now, so why?

Of course, some day Fred'll change all this. He admits that himself.

"Some day, I may go for a nice house in Beverly Hills. You see, I've never had a home of my own, never had a real house of any kind. Always lived with relatives, boarded or lived in hotels and sleeping cars, or railroad coaches when on tour with the band, during my saxophone days. I'd kind of like a home of my own, I guess, when I can afford it."

He always drops that "when I can afford it" into his discussion. You see, he's not sure yet that this stardom and big income are going to last. That's why he's saving the money he's getting now. Fred is no spender.

His recent marriage to Lillian Lamont was no surprise. In fact, it was expected for months.

For fun, he does the simple things that you and I and the fellow nextdoor do. His close pal is Dean Jaggers, another young actor whom Fred thinks is just as good an actor, or better, than Fred MacMurray. "He just didn't get the lucky breaks and I did," is Fred's explanation of why Dean Jaggers is still an unknown.

Anyway, Dean and his wife have a little place hidden back in Laurel Canyon, on the Hollywood outskirts. It's not in the movie colony at all. The stars turn their noses up when they drive through the neighborhood. But that's where Dean, Fred and Lillian gather for such things as Sunday breakfasts, and mid-week parties that break up at ten at night.

It's no whoopee. Just quiet parties. Maybe be a half dozen people, and besides Fred and Dean, there aren't any movie folk there. Fred and Dean have a set of acts they put on—one's a trick mind-reading routine they've worked out together. They astound their guests with it, but it's all done by code. Besides that, Fred's an amateur magician of no mean ability. He pulls rabbits out of hats, and tells you what card you've drawn out of a shuffled deck, and things like that. He and Dean are whizzes at Hollywood's new fad of "handies"—doing tricks with your fingers, and things like that, you know. Simple stuff, but fun.

When he goes out for his fun, Fred stays in character, too. No yachting parties on chartered boats. No hunting trips to far-off Mexico. No airplane tours of the world. Fred's two big ideas of outdoor fun are either taking a 500-mile auto drive in a day, or going with Dean Jaggers and that crowd down to an obscure public beach, far away from movie-star-jammed Malibu. They take along a package from the butcher's and another from the baker's—wienies in one and rolls in the other. Fred or Dean has a bottle of mustard in a pocket.

They build a fire, toast the wienies and burn their fingers toasting them. They slap 'em inside the rolls, smear 'em with mustard, and think they're having more fun than all the snooty people at Malibu. And they are!

AFFECTATION is just a strange word to him. He doesn't even go in for kidding the fan-writers with a fake library. He admits he doesn't care much for reading. He doesn't pose as an authority on Shakespeare, astronomy, or antiques.

His chief indoor sport is eating and he isn't a bit ashamed of it! He'd much rather have a mess of corned beef and cabbage than a parfait. On the set, he's always keeping the messenger boys running after doughnuts or pie or peanuts for him to nibble on, and when they can't find him anywhere else, when the set-up is ready for a take, they send over to the studio cafe and find him on a counter stool, with a cuppacawfee!

He doesn't put on an act, when working. He never stays aloof on the sidelines, or hidden in a private dressing-room, like most other stars, between takes.

Instead, he's usually puffing on a pipe, sprawled out on a packing box, an odd chair, or a piece of scenery. If he can find a prop bed, a couch, or a chair so placed that he can stretch his six-feet-three out in it and rest his feet somewhere higher than his head, he's happy. He drags a wheezy old pipe out of his pocket, stuffs it with dime tobacco, and puffs away, until they're ready to shoot again.

Movies still bewilder him. That is, his position in them. That's why, in all likelihood, he'll surprise himself by remaining as popular as he is at this moment, because he'll never believe that he's really an actor, or has any extraordinary charm. And so he'll remain as downright simple, as forthright as a college sophomore. And that is the charm of Fred MacMurray.

"Maybe it is," he admits, bashfully. "But that's all I can do. It's no trick on my part. If they ever expect me to act, I'm sunk, I can tell you!"

And yet, paradoxically, he hopes that some day he'll be allowed to play a dramatic role, instead of the typical "MacMurray roles" he's been doing. Only he hopes that when he does get the chance, he'll have a good director. "Because all I can do is what they tell me," he explained.

You know, of course, that he's really had no acting training—he got into the movies through his saxophone. Like the music itself, he "went 'round and 'round"—college dance band, professional dance orchestra, night clubs, a week or two on the stage in a New York show, singing a number or two. He was so bashful when they first gave him a chorus to sing, with the band, that he insisted on sitting down and singing through a megaphone, rather than standing up where people could see him! And so "'round and 'round" he went and came out on a Paramount stage, a movie hero!

The speed of it all leaves him breathless. "Gosh," he told me the other day, "only the other night I went to a premiere. Lights and crowds, and me in evening clothes! Was I scared! And there I was, on the inside—and I couldn't help looking at the crowds and remembering that barely more than a year ago, I was one of them, out there behind the ropes and the cops, trying to get a better look at those on the inside. And now here I was, a star myself. Darn, but it made me feel funny. And when I saw the fellow coming at me with the microphone, I got more scared than ever, and beat it.

BUT if all this appears as though Fred, despite his surprise, is taking it all unthinkingly and as a matter of course, you're badly mistaken. "I'm learning everything I can," he told me. "There's a lot to learn in this business, and I'm keeping my eyes and ears open, trying to learn it. I've got swell teachers. They're all grand to me.

"Don't let 'em kid you about this professional-jealousy stuff. Everyone I've ever played opposite in a picture—Claudette Colbert, Katharine Hepburn, Joan Bennett, Carole Lombard, all of 'em—have helped me, unstintingly. They never ritzed me, or tried to upstage me or give me the bad camera angle."

He's studying voice, knowing that his speaking voice and his singing voice will be a big factor in determining the length of his screen popularity. He wants to stay in pictures, but he isn't trusting to fickle fan worship to keep him there; he's working to earn a steady place on the screen.

Just now he's got to learn how to ride all over again. He used to ride horses when he was young, but while he was saxophoning, he forgot the trick. Then he was cast for "The Texas Rangers," and had to do a lot of fast riding.

Fred is somehow a bit different today from the individual he was a year ago. He has learned the fundamentals of poise. There is a self-assuredness about him now that wasn't there, when he first hit the top. He can talk, too, without the evident embarrassment that marked him at the outset. A half year ago, he couldn't talk about himself at all, and shut up like a clam when you asked him to. Today, he has learned to parry unwanted questions with a bit of verbal fencing, instead of an annoyed stare and a brusque, half-angry answer. He has overcome his shyness and reticence, because he knows that movie-stardom and shyness don't go together always. He has learned that he may express an opinion of his own and get away with it; a half year ago, he didn't dare to.

And so he's finally admitting that stardom isn't bad at all, and in fact, he rather likes it. A half year ago, when I first talked to him, he didn't think he would.

family). If Margaret Sullavan's is noticed at all, it's because it is the only motion picture star's home in Hollywood that has only one bedroom.

The garage, too, isn't up to the usual Toluca garageful. One car occupies space there. Until the recent accident to her arm, she has always driven herself. Now, Charlie, doubling as butler-chauffeur, is at the wheel, and Peggy hates it almost as much as interviews, which should give you a rough idea.

There is no economic necessity for her unostentatious way of living. Her salary, which has jumped from a stock player's minimum five years ago, is now in the upper brackets. More than a great many players who can't—but do—she can afford to splurge, but doesn't. Once she read that she had attended a Hollywood premiere on an evening when she had been working at the studio.

"I knew it couldn't be me anyway," she laughed, "because I was described as wearing an ermine wrap and I'm the girl in Hollywood who doesn't own one."

She doesn't have expensive jewels either. Her prize possession is a little diamond ring in an old-fashioned gold setting. It was her ex-husband, William Wyler's, anniversary gift to her. She wears it on her left pinkie.

Clothes, when she couldn't afford them, were never an aspired passion. Now that she can have them, her interest hasn't heightened any. Last year, when she came back from her honeymoon abroad, she went on her first shopping orgy at one of New York's leading couturiers. She succumbed to a divine white taffeta evening frock, an adorable black chiffon with white lace collar and cuffs, a peach and tan sports ensemble and a tailored negligee. But when Madame held up a pair of beach trunks with coat to match and exclaimed, "You simply must have this. It's only $95." Peggy came out of her coma.

"I wouldn't pay that for a beach outfit if I were Barbara Hutton," was her sensible retort.

Her favorite form of attire, both on the screen and off, are slacks. In "The Moon's Our Home," her wardrobe was one of the most expensive she has ever had, but the only two costumes that she was at all excited about were her slacks in the opening scene and the ski suit.

She despises hats. A few summers ago, when she was appearing in a stock revival of "Coquette," I went shopping with her for a blue hat to match the dress she was to wear in the first act. It was a terrible ordeal for Peggy, but she submitted nobly—and bought the first one she tried on. I wasn't the least bit surprised, however, on opening night, to see her make her entrance with the hat in her hand. A second later, she placed it on a table, where it remained ingloriously for the rest of the act.

According to her mimeographed studio biography, "Miss Sullavan loves to cook and sew." If she does, it's a secret between herself and her biography. Of course, she'll tell you that her onion soup can compete with the best at "Les Halles" in Paris and she'll even threaten to make it for you on cook's night out. Her "bluff" has been called every other Sunday night, but we're all still waiting. As for sewing—it is one of the maidenly arts in which this daughter of the old South does not excel, despite her mother's early teachings.

Perhaps this lack of domesticity is due to the fact that since her boarding-school days, she has never had a home of her own. A college "dorm" at Sullins, furnished apartments on the road and in New York and rented bungalows in Hollywood have been her background for the past ten years. It is only when she visits New York as the house guest of very old friends that the atmosphere of a real home is brought back to her, and she wants one of her own.

FOR the first time in her life she is beginning to feel the need of personal possessions around her. She has just bought an oil painting, a portrait of a young girl, by Campbell Phillips, and she is as thrilled over it as Lupe Velez is over her two armsful of diamond bracelets. Authentic antiques, fine linens and lovely glassware will follow soon. If she returns to New York next winter for a stage play, they'll find their way to a small terraced apartment overlooking the East River. If she remains in Hollywood to sign another long-term contract, they'll be on display in a newly furnished home high on the hilltops.

She still prefers New York to Hollywood, but she isn't as rabid in her Hymn of Hate as she used to be. Many of the young crowd she used to know in the old days of the University Players have joined the trek West and it is with these friends that she enjoys being most.

Her two best friends, however, live in New York. They are the parents of a former school mate, and Peg lavishes her affection and loyalty on them. Two years ago, as part of her European holiday, she had planned to visit Italy. For months she had been looking forward to the trip, and then, on the eve of her departure from England to Italy, she received a cable informing her that her friend had undergone a major operation in New York. Without even stopping to think twice, she cancelled the long anticipated visit and caught the fastest boat home.

It is in important instances like this that her thoughtfulness manifests itself. In the little things—remembering birthdays, writing "thank you" notes, or writing at all—she is notoriously negligent. She drives her friends into a state with her tomb-like silences and they threaten never to speak to her again. But they always do when, with wide-eyed innocence, she gives them her most enchanting smile and exclaims, "But, darling, when I don't write you know I'm all right, so you shouldn't worry." (This conversation took place from her hospital bed, just after she had broken her arm.)

With true southern coquetry, she is perfect in the art of getting what she wants when she wants it. When she turns on charm, she rarely misses her victim.

Another part of Peggy's fatal fascination is her ability to tell bigger whoppers than anyone but "Baron Munchausen." Now don't misunderstand me. Basically, she is honest. It is only when she finds it expedient to avoid things, without hurting people, that she is a fibber. As in everything she does, she usually gets away with it, but again, there is always the exception to prove the rule.

A few summers ago, when she stopped over in New York en route to Europe, she used to spend every day thinking up white lies to tell a persistent young man who constantly phoned her. Finally, the day she sailed, she told him she had received an SOS to return to the Coast immediately for her next picture. The first day out at sea, she discovered "the persistent young man" on board. And the funniest part of it is that when she got to know him, she liked him enormously and regretted all the dates she had turned down.

Peg's greatest "fish" story, however, happens to be true. Once she caught a 150-pound Marlin and she was more excited about her feat than over any performance she has ever given on stage or screen.

Besides fishing, her pet enthusiasms are track meets, Helen Hayes, talking her way out of fines for speeding, her young brother, "Sonny," and spoon bread.

Her pet hate, at the moment, is anyone who asks her whether she is going to remarry Henry Fonda. And because I'm so "Fonda" (ouch!) of Peggy, I wouldn't ask her.

But the answer is, "No, no, a thousand times, no!" Honestly, folks, this is the real McCoy, "on account of" a little bird whispered it to me. Her name is "Magpie" Sullavan.

to, yet she managed to leave with no loose ends dangling. And she didn't dash pell-mell, either. Fay's never superficially excited, and heaven will vouch for me when I state that you can't hurry her.

She wasn't angry with good-looking John Monk Saunders, to whom she has stayed happily married—in and despite Hollywood. The task of combining two careers (he's a famous author, playwright, and scenarist) with an ideal union has been no trouble for her. She wasn't suddenly bored, nor had she scrapped with her bosses. I know for a fact that Fay's never spoken a cross word or behaved temperamentally. Hers is a marvelous disposition that's under amazing control.

You not only can't ruffle her, but you can't argue with Fay. When you suggest that she'd be wise to do a specific thing, and she has already reached another logical conclusion, she doesn't fall into the trap of retorting, "Why should I do that?" Instead, she carefully refrains from raising her voice and repeats calmly, "I think not."

Hardly ever is she impetuous. She wasn't when she left us for England. "I've never been a skyrocket and I don't suppose I ever shall be," she says candidly. "But I enjoy acting so much I want to go on and on until I'm too aged to win a bit role. I want to last. And that's why I decided I'd better stop making pictures here for awhile."

A little ambiguous? Follow on and let Fay thoroughly explain her reasons for her exceptional conduct when she had so many offers in Hollywood that she merely had to decide which was to be next.

"I feel that to last on the screen one must be more than a pleasant personality; to be exact, one must act! I'm not worrying about acquiring wrinkles, but it is obvious to me that youthful attractiveness was my entree. I believe that now I should prepare to handle genuine characterizations. Tomorrows will be more demanding."

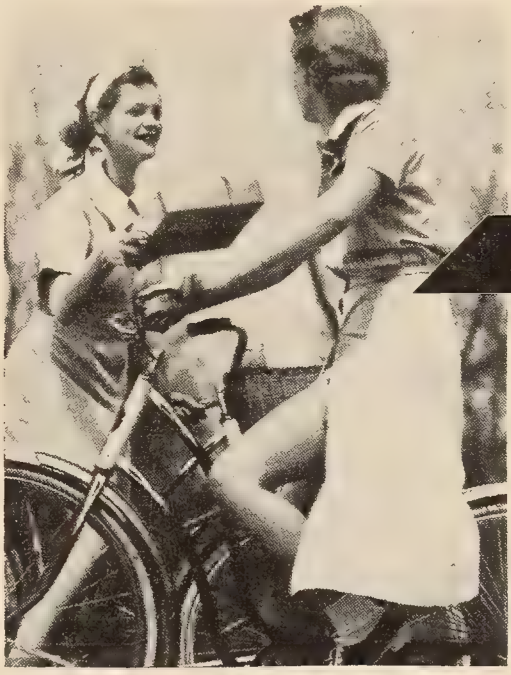
KOTEX CAN'T CHAFE

The sides of Kotex are cushioned in a special, soft, downy cotton to prevent chafing and irritation. Thus Wondersoft Kotex provides lasting comfort and freedom. But sides only are cushioned—the center surface is free to absorb.



KOTEX CAN'T FAIL

Kotex has a special "Equalizer" center whose channels guide moisture evenly the whole length of the pad. Gives "body" but not bulk—prevents twisting and roping. The filler of Kotex is actually 5 TIMES more absorbent than cotton.

KOTEX CAN'T SHOW

The rounded ends of Kotex are flattened and tapered to provide absolute invisibility. Even the sheerest dress, the closest-fitting gown, reveals no telltale wrinkles.

isn't quite the same as she who was with us before. But don't be alarmed—you aren't in for one of those perennial transformation tales. I can't be trite about Fay, for she won't fit into any conventional pattern. She's changed, but her development has been no incredible, overnight blossoming. And it's by no means completed, in her estimation.

When mentioning herself Fay has an economy of words that is defeating to the average interviewer. She's been Hollywood's most industrious woman, but nevertheless she has no flair for dramatizing her actions.

"I accepted a great many roles, because I expected to learn by doing so. Eventually, I discovered I was in a whirlpool of pictures. There was no chance to even contemplate further improvement, for I was awakening to a regular succession of sets. Literally, I was in a maze of movies.

"I'd been tempted by those foreign bids. Finally, I realized I might become too provincial—I'd gone directly to work from Hollywood high school classes. I'd never had time to go abroad. Why not see what some of the rest of the world was like? It would give me additional perspective. So I cabled yes to a British offer."

Fate kindly proceeded to help Fay. English producers shortly afterwards advised her husband that he could write his own ticket if he'd come over and script plots for them. So soon John joined her in London. He was familiar with the country's historical landmarks which she was anxious to visit, having been a Rhodes scholar at Oxford. The gifted Mr. and Mrs. Saunders revelled in the sophisticated-but-traditional atmosphere and were so popular that they stayed on and on.

It is simple to investigate Europe when you can hop into a plane from London. Still, to travel advantageously is an art. John took Fay on exhilarating jaunts when both were between assignments. And whether it was Paris or a peasant village, Fay absorbed what she was seeing.

She was blithely skiing at St. Moritz when Columbia urged her to come home. "John and I consulted. An author may tarry as long as he wishes; there's always a market for stories. But an actress's audience is more fickle. I didn't want American fans to forget me."

There are imported Parisian models in the wardrobe she brought back; yet if she notices a pretty frock in a small, side-street shop she's apt to buy it. Labels have ceased to cow her. She could afford a liveried chauffeur and plenty of star trimmings; she shuns complications driving herself and residing in a house that's untouched by passing fads.

"Study is next for me," she vows. "I have had a grounding in pantomime; I've had a generous measure of travel. Now I want to consolidate, as it were. I want ability, rather than to rely on talent—which is bound to be erratic. Knowledge, instead of instinct."

And Fay isn't just talking for effect. Three months ago she went to a noted Hollywood singing teacher. "I'm not ambitious for opera," she informed her, "but I want to cultivate my voice. Maybe it will be convenient to be able to sing passably someday."

Henceforth the Wray motto is quality—not quantity. When she finished "Roaming Lady" for Columbia, she signed with this studio for three pictures annually. She has the privilege of doing whatever other films she wishes. Her next film, "There Goes the Bride," with Chester Morris, has just been completed.

Fay's picture career will be at a standstill for a few months, at least, for she is expecting a little heir or heiress any day now.

Infinitely appreciative, Fay is never gushing. I can swear to you that she doesn't drink. Poised as she usually is, this distractingly complex gal still wishes she might be positive of a stranger's attitude before being introduced. She has yet to overcome a natural shyness.

I wouldn't brand her mysterious, for Fay is obligingly straightforward on any subject you care to bring up. But you simply cannot catalog her satisfyingly. She's a beauty, for instance, with two libraries in her home. An inveterate reader, she was in the upstairs one—it is book-shelved from floor to ceiling—when she answered my queries about her plans.

I have never caught her using slang, but she does adore pig-Latin! She was so tickled when Cockney admirers addressed her as Fye Wrye that she is signing all her personal telegrams this way.

The naïve girl who's grown into today's inscrutable charmer has lost none of her innate sincerity. Behind her placidity is determination, but it's not the blatant kind. Warmly feminine and astonishingly capable—when you try to analyze her she's a modern Mona Lisa. I can tell you all about her fascinations. Then she'll smile, and I'm sure I don't know her at all!

Defrosting Dietrich

died. It must have knocked Marlene as nothing in life ever hit her before. She must have realized, in the turmoil of her soul, that there were things so far, far greater than any of us that she must have felt ashamed. Mind you, I don't say anything but what I guess. But when Jack was taken from her, she knew that there were some things she could not command or order by a finger-snap!

And the changed Marlene began then.

LET'S take a look at today's Marlene. I don't have to bore you with a picture of the Marlene of a half year ago. You, who follow the film news and doings, know. On the Selznick lot, they knew, too. That's why they were all scared when Dietrich came over from Paramount. They were scared to death when they showed her her dressing-room—a dinky, tawdry little cubbyhole in a row of other dressing-rooms. They expected fireworks but they didn't get them. Marlene just walked in, said thank you, and for several weeks worked in that tiny bit-player's cubicle without a kick.

When they finally, after rushing it to completion, showed her the bungalow suite they'd built for her, she was astonished. They thought she'd sweep regally in with an air of "this is hardly good enough for me." Instead, she protested that it was too much to have done for her. And from then on, Dietrich's bungalow became open-house for one and all.

If you crave romance in your movies, you'll find it in "The Garden of Allah," as this pose of Dietrich and Charles Boyer indicates.

Her private suite used to be as unapproachable as Queen Mary's boudoir. Today, her co-workers, publicity men, casual interviewers, others, pop in and out the door as though it were—say—Jack Oakie's hangout. Marlene's always glad to see them. And so, gradually, the awe wore off and they began to tell how regular Marlene was. Hollywood pricked up its ears and wouldn't believe the tales.

But let me tell you all about the other night, on the studio back lot, when I saw Marlene let down her hair and clown it! It was during one of those tediously interminable setting-up processes, when everybody was bored to death with waiting.

Suddenly Marlene, under the lights, went into an act.

"Look, I'm Paulette Goddard," she cried. And she gave a take-off on Chaplin's gal-friend that had the onlookers pop-eyed with astonishment and giggles. Then suddenly, she became Garbo—she turned away from the spectators for a moment, pulled her hair down in a Garbo-ish frieze across her forehead, twisted her face. When she looked at them, it was as though a clever caricaturist had cartooned Greta the Great.

Joan Crawford next—it was amazing to see that elfin face of Marlene's transform itself into the huge-eyed, Joan-mouthed travesty on Crawford that followed.

Suddenly Marlene stopped. Her face changed and the sad mask that is so characteristic of her, dropped over it again. It was as though you'd suddenly turned off a battery of floodlights and left one feeble light burning. She walked listlessly back to an upturned soda-pop box, behind the lights, and sat down alone. No fancy chair for the star, no attendants hovering about with cigarettes, lights,

MANY NEVER SUSPECT CAUSE OF BACKACHES

This Old Treatment Often Brings Happy Relief Of Pain

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are one of Nature's chief ways of taking the acids and waste out of the blood. If they don't pass 3 pints a day and so get rid of more than 3 pounds of waste matter, your 15 miles of kidney tubes may need flushing.

If you have trouble with frequent bladder passages with scanty amount which often smart and burn, the 15 miles of kidney tubes may need flushing out. This danger signal may be the beginning of nagging backache, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes and dizziness.

powder, attentions. She just sat there, surrounded by extras, hardly distinguishable from them.

They finished setting up. Boleslawski looked for her but didn't see her. In the old days, they'd have sent a nice assistant director to find her, and he'd have approached her with: "Ah, Miss Dietrich, please. We're ready to shoot—IF you are."

None of that now with the new Dietrich. Boleslawski just raised his voice and yelled for her.

"Hey! C'mon, sister! Let's get a move on. We're late now."

"Don't hurry me, MISTER Boleslawski," she said. "Don't you know I have to maintain my reputation? I'm a gal who takes her ti-i-i-i-ime. . .!"

Marlene, believe it or not, was kidding not only Mae West, but she was kidding Dietrich too!

That sort of thing is new to Dietrich.

Whatever it is, it has made Marlene the most popular girl on the lot. That's new, too. They used to admire her, respect her, stand in awe of her. But they never really liked her. Now, in the colloquialism of the lot, everybody from the lowliest errand boy to the studio bosses, is simply nuts about Marlene.

THEY tell of how regular, how human and how kind she was on that gruelling desert location for "The Garden of Allah." She got up at 4:30 in the morning, with the rest of the crew, because they could only shoot from 6 to 9 or so, and then again a few hours in the late afternoon. She didn't complain or demand that people be fired, because bugs got down her neck and sand in her eyes and flies in her soup.

She didn't have private waitresses to bring her specially prepared meals in the seclusion of her own tent. She ate in the big commissary tent, side by side with electricians, Mexican extras, prop boys, and the hoi polloi of the lot. She ate just what they ate, most of the time. Now and then, she'd send to Yuma for some delicacy she particularly likes. Then she'd invite a lot of folks to have it with her—and not the big bosses, either. It'd be a prop man, or a dressmaker, or her make-up girl. The queen was down to earth.

They fixed up an elaborate tent for her. It had two rooms and a bath. There was a pongee silk lining under the tent-top. There were electric fans, bamboo matting and rug-covered floors, a radio, an electric range, a chaise longue, a refrigerator and an electric hair dryer.

Marlene raised a quizzical eyebrow at the imperial suite—and spent most of her time out of it. She was always joking or talking with the men and women on the set, rather than resting between shots in her magnificent retreat. And many nights, she'd motor to Yuma and take a hotel room, instead. She tramped the streets of Yuma at night, ate in little lunchrooms, smiled, shook hands and stopped to talk with townsfolk who recognized her. She wasn't putting on any airs. Why, she drove to Yuma the first day in her 16-cylinder town car. The next day she sent it back and hired a little coupe which she used the rest of the time, driving herself. They asked her why.

"People stared at me. They thought I was trying to be a great movie actress. I didn't like it," she said naïvely.

In the old days, Marlene and her director, Joe von Sternberg used to look at the day's rushes in carefully guarded secrecy. Nobody else could crash in.

On the desert, they showed the day's rushes each evening in the big commissary tent. Everybody came, including Marlene. She sat not apart, on some regal throne, but on a folding chair in the midst of a gang of humble workers, watching her rushes with them. Twice, they showed other movies there for entertainment. One night, the film was Marlene's own "Desire." Just as the machine began, Marlene heard the sounds of dish-scraping from the kitchen of the big tent. She cried: "Stop it. Wait a minute." Dietrich, resplendent in pale robin's-egg blue silk pajamas that clung tighter than a one-piece bathing suit, dashed into the kitchen where a horde of greasy, dirty-aproned Mexican peons were at work.

"Hey," she cried, "stop working. Come on out and see it with me."

TIMID, diffident, the Mexicans half-wiped their dirty hands on their aprons, clustered about this fairy-vision and followed her into the hall. She sat down. They sat down beside her, around her. She was a bit taken aback for a moment—she didn't think they'd take her that literally. But then she smiled, made herself at home and sat with them watching the film. When it was finished, she shook hands with each of them as they congratulated her in Spanish.

On location, an electrician ran a car off the roadside, was injured. They took up a collection to help his family in the crisis. Marlene dropped $500 into the hat! The only touch of temper and temperament she's displayed in months came when the publicity man told her he wanted to plant a story on that.

"Don't you dare!" she flared. "I am not doing it for publicity, and I forbid you. I get pleasure out of doing these little things for people. I don't want it spoiled by a beastly publicity story."

The publicity man never mentioned it again. He's nuts about Marlene, too, even though she did bawl him out. He's still chuckling about the $10,000-a-week photo-tinter who worked for him. He had some 11-by-14-inch portraits of Marlene for a newspaper that wanted to run them as color prints. He was hunting for an expert photo-tinter one day when Marlene dropped into his office. She heard him.

"Ooo, I used to tint pictures," she told him. "Back in Germany, in school, we were taught how, and we used to color and sell postcard photos of movie actresses."

"Well, why don't you go to work for me, and tint these of yourself?" he asked, as a gag. She fooled him, she took him up. He supplied the colors and brushes, and she carried the paraphernalia and photos back to her dressing-room.

That day, she was an hour and a half late reporting on the set. She was so busy tinting the photos that she forgot all about the time. AND—the work was so perfect that many a professional would have envied its perfection. Marlene thought it was great fun.

I asked Marlene, the other night, about this change in her. "Just a few months ago, you had the reputation of being so unapproachable, so cold," I told her. "Now they're raving about how swell you are, how human and warm and—"

"Change?" she asked. "I have changed? I do not think so. At least, I do not know I have changed, if—as you say— I have. Maybe you heard tales from people who did not know me, and spoke of what they did not know?"

I pointed out that I'd talked with those who'd worked with her day in and day out, and how everyone was commenting on the change.

"I did not know," she said softly. "If I have—I don't know—I am always just myself."

father with the combined aid of the town saloon-keeper, its leading gambler, the barber and the leading lady of the saloon's entertainment committee. But so sympathetically is it played by the entire cast and so intelligently has the simple story been made into engrossing screen fare that you and your whole family will find it delightful entertainment. John Beal has a role ideally suited to him—that of the school teacher who comes to Smith's Pocket and gains the respect of the villagers and the love of M'liss. Guy Kibbee is grand as the inebriated parent. Moroni Olsen couldn't be improved upon as the saloon keeper and the same applies to Douglas Dumbrille and Frank M. Thomas in their characterizations.

In 1918 Mary Pickford appeared in the celluloid silent version of the story. . . . This marks the fourth time that George Nicholls, Jr., has directed Anne Shirley and they're becoming one of the most famous star-director teams in Hollywood. Mr. Nicholls was the one to discover Anne in the first place, insisting that the fourteen-year-old girl be given a chance in "Finishing School" and then railroading her into a test for "Anne of Green Gables." . . . Most of the locations were in the San Fernando Valley, which most nearly approximates the scenery of the Bret Harte country. The sets included a typical 1885 Main Street, with its saloon, "tonsorial emporium," village stores, etc. It all looks pretty ramshackle on the screen, but it took the RKO carpenters plenty of time and effort to create that impression and still construct the buildings well enough to stand the wear and tear of the long production. Costumes and property took no little time to collect and fabricate, since they are all authentic to the period down to the last stage-coach. . . . John Beal, dividing his time between the stage and screen, has managed to be successful in both mediums, though more familiar to Broadway than Hollywood so far. He left the cast of "Russet Mantle" to play this role.

★★★★ San Francisco

(M-G-M)

Every once in a while Hollywood comes across with a lusty, two-fisted drama—a moving picture that really moves—and when such an event occurs it is our duty to shout its praises to its potential clientele.

Such a movie is "San Francisco." It's a story of the great bay city in the early 1900's, when the earthquake and the fire put an end to the city's most colorful era. There's drama in the story itself, but it's the earthquake and fire scenes which give the film its pace and its excitement. A perfect job of casting has Clark Gable as the proprietor of a gilded palace on Barbary Coast, Jeanette MacDonald as a choir singer, who becomes an entertainer in the Gable honky-tonk, and Spencer Tracy as a priest and pal of Gable's. The Gable-MacDonald combination is a swell idea, for it gives them both an opportunity to turn in their finest performances of the past couple of seasons. And you may not believe it, but Spencer Tracy as the priest almost steals the picture. Others in the cast are Ted Healy, Jack Holt and Jessie Ralph.

Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studios was nearly shaken down several times for the earthquake sequences on this picture, but not one accident occurred during the entire production. . . . Al Shean, in case you didn't know, is both the Shean of Gallagher and Shean and also uncle to the Marx Brothers. He thinks being a movie actor is more fun than either. . . . The boys' choir used for several numbers here is the famous Long Beach Boys' Choir, which is fast becoming one of the most popular in the country and is destined for a long tour this summer. . . . Most of the sets were built on the lot, but there were two location sites—one at Sunland, California, and the final big scene was shot in Lafayette Park in Los Angeles.

★★★ The White Angel

(First National)

The story of Florence Nightingale suffers a bit in celluloid. This is far from being a poor picture, but considering the splendid and moving story on which it is based, the picture proves a trifle disappointing. There are, however, a couple of scenes, particularly the "Lady with the Lamp," which have such sincere feeling and beauty that they overshadow the artificiality of some of the others. As far as the story is concerned they have adhered to the authentic details throughout, which adds to the picture's value. Surprisingly enough, Kay Francis' good looks are enhanced by the severity of her costumes. Her perception of the role is sympathetic but hardly expressive of the courage and faith which must have been the chief characteristics of such a woman as Florence Nightingale. Good in supporting roles are Donald Crisp, as an army surgeon, Donald Woods, as the man who loves Florence Nightingale, Ian Hunter, her staunch friend, and Billy Mauch, a drummer boy.

That scene where Kay Francis lies ill in bed may look like a snap to you, but it was one of the most difficult scenes, requiring the star to lie in bed for five days and assume a pained expression, as if she were suffering from malaria. The brooch which adorns her simple garments is actually one which belonged to Florence Nightingale herself. . . . Among the many interesting settings was the waterfront and village of Scutari. The Scutari set was built on the old Vitagraph lot, where there's a large lake. Along the lake front a complete section of Scutari was constructed—a series of low-arched buildings of Moorish architecture. Of the interior sets, the most impressive was the hospital, which covered one entire sound stage.

★ Three Cheers for Love
(Paramount)

With nothing to recommend it outside of some swell tap dancing, "Three Cheers For Love" gets no cheers and no praise. A highly unbelievable story has Eleanore Whitney, as the daughter of an important movie producer, going East to a fashionable girls' finishing school. The school, it seems, is on the rocks—it has, in fact, not a single student. Bill Frawley, an enterprising and insolvent theatrical impresario, conceives the idea of filling up the school with chorus girls to make the place look thriving. There is also a brilliant plan which includes putting on a school show for the benefit of Eleanore's father (John Halliday). Papa will see the show and buy it for a terrific sum for the movies. If you think he doesn't do just that you don't know your picture plots. Robert Cummings has the male lead, and his work can best be described by dragging out that time-worn adjective, adequate. Eleanore Whitney is a cute gal and has considerable talent in her toes—enough, certainly, to warrant her stepping into more favorable surroundings.

★★★ My Man Godfrey
(Universal)

As nutty and hilarious a comedy as ever came out of Hollywood, this will give you more delightful moments than almost any picture you've seen in the past several months. With Carole Lombard and Bill Powell co-starred under Gregory LaCava's direction, it has a sure-fire combination that comes through with banners flying. Just to give you an idea of how things are, here's how the two principals meet: Carole, out on a scavenger hunt, is scheduled to bring back The Forgotten Man. She goes to a hobo camp near the city dump, and picks out, of all people, Bill Powell. Fancy meeting him there! She starts liking the guy, and he becomes butler for her family, which includes Alice Brady, Eugene Pallette and Gail Patrick. And in that merry little group so many strange things come about that by the time the picture is over you're actually not sure what happened. All we know is that it's a swell picture, with Mr. Powell and the ex-Mrs. Powell giving grand performances.

Preview Postscript

For the first time since their friendly divorce of three years ago, Carole Lombard and Bill Powell are together in a picture. There was nothing unusual in their actions toward one another on the sets, for they have always been swell pals both in private and public life. . . . Practical jokers, piano players, singers, wits and any other distracting influences were welcome on the set when Gregory La Cava was directing this picture. Horseplay is generally strictly banned, but realizing this story was more or less insane from start to finish, the director set out to obtain two things from his players—spirit and pace. One minute's let-down couldn't be afforded, so laughter, music and fun were the order of every day between shots. One of the grimiest sets ever constructed was the city dump, which covered three acres. The decorations included tin cans, broken-down stoves, refuse and such. In contrast to this was the next set, representing the lobby of one of New York's famous hotels, resplendent with gilt and plush and all the trappings of the upper crust of sassiety. It was one of the most expensive sets the studio has ever built.

★★ Spendthrift
(Wanger-Paramount)

You won't remember much about this picture except that you had a swell time. Henry Fonda is the young man who finds himself burdened with too many polo ponies, yachts and such accessories, but not a red cent in his pocket. Pat Paterson is the girl whose one love is horses, a passion inherited from her father, J. M. Kerrigan, who's the trainer of Henry's hosses. She soon finds that they take second place in her affections to their owner. That's a bit embarrassing all around since Mary Brian, one of those predatory southan gals, happens to be Henry's wife. It's all very lively and likable stuff, with just enough complications to pass as a plot. You'll like the Fonda and Paterson humor and Mary Brian is—well, adorable is the only word we can think of even if she is a gold-digger. George Barbier, Edward Brophy and Richard Carle all come through with excellent performances in minor roles.

★★ Counterfeit (Columbia)

"Counterfeit" is a story of the queer money racket. Besides an interesting peek at the methods of the boys who make their own, it offers a sufficient quota of excitement and plot to make it good average screenfare. Action centers about the activities of a counterfeit ring which uses a beautiful blonde (Margot Grahame) to peddle its product. Selling $50,000 in cash for cut rates is no trick at all, especially for a gal like Margot. But she runs into a jam when Chester Morris, posing as a crook, tries to snatch a bag full of money from her. Cops get into the mix-up, but she and Chester elude them and escape to the ring's hideout. The leader, Lloyd Nolan, is impressed by the Morris daring and takes him on as his assistant. It's a nice job, but you never get two-weeks' notice. Your final notice is a brief message from the Nolan .45. Also at the hideout is Margot's young sister, Marian Marsh, an innocent young girl who thinks counterfeiting is downright mean. Mr. Morris thinks so, too, for he's really a Federal man, and after he learns all the gang's secrets he wires the boys back in Washington. The boys proceed to put the blast on the hideout, counterfeiting is stamped out, and wedding bells loom for Morris and Marsh.

first one to use the U. S. Treasury building for a set. Because the counterfeit money question intrigued the government officials, permission was obtained to move into the holy of holies and shoot the works. Furthermore, every assistance was given Columbia on technical questions. However, you won't see any of Uncle Sam's gold or greenbacks pictured in this or any other film—an idea of the Hays Office that no money can ever be shown on the screen. . . . Chester Morris was borrowed from M-G-M for this role and following his performance here decided to stick by Columbia for good; now M-G-M will have to do the borrowing.

★★ Hearts Divided
(Warners-Cosmopolitan)

Marion Davies is all togged out in the frills and furbelows of Betsy Patterson, Dick Powell in the frills and furbelows of Napoleon's kid brother, while even Arthur Treacher, Edward Everett Horton and Charlie Ruggles come in for their share of decorations. The prop and wardrobe departments are the ones who deserve the bows on this picture with one notable exception. That is Claude Rains in the role of Napoleon Bonaparte. A better characterization has seldom, if ever, seen celluloid. The story is authentic as far as it goes, ending of course with the reunion of divided hearts (Miss Davies' and Mr. Powell's) after Napoleon has refused to sanction their marriage and Betsy Patterson has given Dick back to France only to have him follow her to America on the next boat. Excellent photography, scenery and Mr. Rains' performance constitute the picture's appeal.

★★ Parole (Universal)

If you're in the mood to grapple with a problem, this picture will solve your evening's entertainment. To parole or not to parole, that is the question. And from such slim pickings is developed an interesting tale. Much of this celluloider's success is due to a couple of people of whom you probably know little or nothing. We'll put our guarantee on Henry Hunter, radio's latest gift to the cinema, and vouch for Ann Preston, too, who makes her screen debut here. Alan Baxter and Bernadene Hayes, however, give the top performances. For sprightly sass you can't beat Bernadene Hayes and we have yet

"Every decent citizen is interested in an honest parole system"—these words uttered by no less a personage than the President of the United States gave the studio its idea for this one. Before the studio began to cast extras for the big penitentiary scenes, more than 8,800 pictures of "wanted" men were taken from reward circulars. These were combined by artists to provide many composite faces which were used as a guide in selecting types. . . . For four years Ann Preston has been talking into radio microphones and never knew what the "fidgets" were. But the first time on this set—her first movie venture—she suffered her first pangs. The idea that a "mike" was hidden overcame her. Finally Director Friedlander noticed that his new actress' voice was ~~tightening~~ and nerves were evidently getting the best of her, so he came to the rescue, suspecting the trouble that most radio performers have when they first go on a movie set and explained that the mike was overhead where the cameras wouldn't pick it up.

★★ Public Enemy's Wife

(Warners)

The moral pointed in this story is that public enemies aren't first-class husband material. Cesar Romero is the gentleman whom Margaret Lindsay has wed for some unfathomable reason. When he's sent up for life Cesar gets the little woman slapped into prison for three years so he will know her whereabouts. On Mrs. Public Enemy's release Mr. P. E. makes a break and follows her, set on getting any guy who hangs around. Millionaire Dick Foran wastes no time getting himself in this spot. But it takes Pat O'Brien, brave G-Man, to marry the gal in order to trap the escaped convict. Follows a hectic honeymoon with the bride and groom cordially loathing each other. Love blooms just when Cesar snatches his ex Pat, and his pal, Robert Armstrong, track them down to a final fight that's worth your money. In fact it's all worth your money, being a fast moving, engrossing plot and capably played by everybody concerned. Margaret Lindsay breaks down and acts human, while Pat O'Brien gives a top-notch performance. Mr. O'B. seems to be surpassing himself with every role of late. Cesar Romero's sneers sent shudders through the preview audience while Robert Armstrong got the laughs with a series of Armstrong antics.

Preview Postscript

A battle raged long and furiously at the studio during this picture's production. Cesar Romero refused point-blank to remove his mustache for the role. A compromise was finally reached whereby Mr. R. would appear sans decoration for the first few reels and grow it back for the fade-out. Margaret Lindsay was accorded the honor of shaving him. . . . Margaret swears she'll never be a blonde again unless she has to rob a bank or something. The strange and sinister-looking gal which she saw in the mirror after the hairdresser had arranged that blonde wig on her which she wears in the first reels decided that. She even stayed in her dressing-room between takes while wearing it, refusing to be seen. That elegant gown Margaret wears in the wedding scene wasn't much fun, either. Just a quarter of an inch too tight when completed, she was compelled to stand up for two days straight while the scene was taken.

★★ The Return of Sophie Lang (Paramount)

Gertrude Michael is the jewel thief whose amazing success has been due to the fact that she's entirely too beautiful to be suspected of having brains. She "returns" this time from the grave. At least there's been a tombstone in the cemetery marking her supposed resting place for the past five years. But Sophie merely buried her past and is now off to a fresh and honest start as the companion of Elizabeth Patterson, an elderly lady who is a swell person in spite of being disgustingly rich. While they're en route to America Sir Guy Standing makes his appearance. Sir Guy, it develops, is undisputed King of Jewel Lifters. When Sophie learns that he has an eye on the Kruger diamond belonging to her employer she brings the old brain power into action again. Follows a tense and exciting battle of wits with King Guy finally exposing Sophie's past and placing all suspicions on her for the diamond's disappearance. Here's where Ray Milland, reporter, steps in and locates the Kruger diamond, then gets Sophie interested in a solitaire of her own. There's plenty of action, humor and excitement and excellent performances by Gertrude Michael, Elizabeth Patterson and Sir Guy Standing.

★★ High Tension

(20th Century-Fox)

With Glenda Farrell and Brian Donlevy in the cast, a picture couldn't be classified as Time Lost. This one is all in the spirit of good clean fun with enough action and romance to satisfy almost any audience. Brian Donlevy is the dashing hero who has two interests in life—repairing ocean cables and making a good impression on Glenda Farrell. The latter is really no trouble at all, since Glenda is so enamored of him that she devotes every spare moment away from his presence in glorifying him in print, being a pulp-writer for adventure tales. Norman Foster contributes a good characterization as Brian's pal and Helen Wood is attractive in the role of secretary. Jasper Sawyer and Robert McWade are excellent in smaller roles. You will find the scenes of deep-sea activities of real interest and there's not a moment's let-down from the opening scene to the closing clinch. There are a couple of fights that it would be a shame to miss seeing, in particular the one where a grand piano proves an effective weapon.

Preview Postscript

Norman Foster's off-set activities were, of course, confined to domesticity, since his wife, Sally Blane, just presented him with a daughter. Her name's Gretchen, in honor of her aunt, Loretta Young, whose real name that is. . . . Glenda Farrell was borrowed from Warner's for this film. That's an event in itself, since the Brothers W. are loathe to part with Glenda for any pictures put out by rival concerns. Another event worth commenting upon is that Glenda has not built herself another new house for the past five months. Moving into new houses happens to be a hobby with Glenda, and even moving her young son, plus several cats, dogs, parrots, chipmunks and white rats, comes under the heading of fun to Glenda. She never has any trouble disposing of the old houses, either, since her friends clamor for each new one she builds and decorates.

★ The Crime of Dr. Forbes

Capitalizing on recent newspaper publicity given to "mercy killings," 20th Century-Fox emerges with a fairly interesting picture whose main fault is that after building up a case, it neatly steps aside and dodges the issue. Here is the story: When a doctor (J. Edward Bromberg) finds he must leave town for a month he asks his laboratory assistant (Robert Kent) to keep his wife (Gloria Stuart) entertained. The young doctor complies, and falls in love with the wife. On the eve of Bromberg's return he is injured in a fall which paralyzes him for life. When the young doctor goes to his aid Bromberg begs him for an overdose of morphine to end his life. He dies that night and his assistant goes on trial for murder. After the entire case is built up on a mercy killing plea, the young doctor tells the court he did not administer the overdose of morphine. From there on the trial and the picture go to pieces. Gloria Stuart is beautiful as the wife, Robert Kent is an attractive and adequate leading man, but the best performance in the picture is J. Edward Bromberg's. Sara Haden and Henry Armetta are effective in supporting roles.

A week's location trip in Tombstone, Arizona, proved to be a gala one for the company. They even had the distinction of a special edition of the "Tombstone Epitaph," the town's leading and only paper, put out in their honor. The cast and company lived in a special train during their stay, since accommodations for such a crowd couldn't be built overnight and the town had never seen a gang like that. However, the company did manage to round up some 400 extras from the town and neighboring hills to play "extras." One native came up to Director George Marshall and announced his desire to become assistant director at once with possibilities of speedy advancement. Director Marshall announced that he had an assistant and liked his work. But when the lad reached for his hip to get his gat, Mr. M. hastily thrust him into one of the more important "extra" roles.

Action, of course, is always guaranteed with a George O'Brien picture, and this one has plenty in the entanglements encountered in the border patrol profession of which Mr. O'Brien is a member. And just to be sure everyone gets his money's worth of excitement they've thrown in a gang of jewel smugglers for good measure. But action isn't the only thing you'll find in this celluloider. There's a good plot, expensive production, and an able supporting cast for the stalwart charms of the star. Polly Ann Young is the gal in the case who is as spoiled a millionaire's granddaughter as ever escaped extermination. But being Polly Ann Young the hero falls madly in love with her even after he's had to relinquish his badge through her efforts. Grandpa (William P. Carleton) then hires George to tame his granddaughter and she immediately gets involved with a bunch of meanies, who are jewel-lifters on the side, to show anyone interested that she can take care of herself. The final reel of getting the girl, jewels and emotions untangled is done with a grand flourish. You'll have a good time.

THE WORLD'S LARGEST SELLING EYE BEAUTY AIDS

Death Valley, California. The season closes there the end of May so the company held off production until that time and had the whole place to themselves. They also had all the heat to themselves. But this didn't faze the company. They arose, not exactly amiably, but anyhow they arose at four o'clock, had breakfast and were at work by five every morning. From 11 to 3 the company laid off work, then continued until sundown. Most of the night was spent in the hotel's beautiful swimming pool, where heated contests were waged between two teams of water-poloists. One team was headed by George O'Brien and was made up of the men in the cast, while the other team was captained by Polly Ann Young and consisted of the gals. . . . Polly Ann, you know, is the sister of the famed Loretta Young and Sally Blane, and in what private life a girl could have in a trio like that she is Mrs. Carter Hermann. Mr. Hermann came with her for the two weeks' location trip and anyone who would brave Death Valley after the last of May must be truly in love.

★ We Went to College

(M-G-M)

There should be a law against wasting a Charles Butterworth or a Una Merkel, to say nothing of throwing around the talents of Walter Catlett and Hugh Herbert. But since there aren't such judicial measures, we might as well get on to the review of this picture. It concerns three sentimental grads who decide on a reunion at the alma mammy after too many years out in the cold world wrestling for a living. Una Merkel is happily, if unromantically, married to Professor Hugh Herbert. But when she sees Walter Abel, her undergraduate flame, Una realizes she's missed the Real Thing and sets about making up for lost time. The fact that her former boy friend has a nice little wife of his own (Edith Atwater) and that Hugh is a good husband and never beats her, doesn't stop Una. The situation, you can see, has plenty of hilarious possibilities but it all falls pretty flat. And that in spite of some of the best laugh landers in celluloid who struggle nobly with the lines dished out to them.

Charles Butterworth was born in the shadow of Notre Dame University quite a few years ago and went there to school also quite a few years ago. After graduating, he stayed around long enough to pass his bar exams, then headed straight for the South Bend News-Times and became a cub reporter. Having always been a murder story fiend, Charles B. decided to try Chicago for work and from there went to New York. A comedy monologue at the Press Club turned out to be funny and encouraged by his editor, Mr. B. left the printer's ink for the stage. Now he's under long-term contract to M-G-M. Ethel Sutherland, of New York, is his wife and they're both familiar figures at first-nights and fight-nights. Mr. Butterworth thinks he's still a reporter at heart, though, since he always finds himself jotting down things people say to him on the cuff, tablecloth, etc. . . . Hugh Herbert hails from the sidewalks of New York along with other eminent Americans and movie stars. A prehistoric brand of "talking" pictures gave him his first chance to get in movies. He was the "voice" behind the screen for all the male characters in pictures which came to a neighborhood theatre. A stock company manager heard the Herbert voice and offered him a job in a Fall River, Mass., stock company. And thus to Broadway, where he gained triple fame as actor, director and author of plays and vaudeville sketches.

★ The Arizona Raiders

(Paramount)

For a western opry this is pretty good fare. In the first place it's a Zane Grey story which gives it a good start. In the second place the action is balanced with good dialogue and in the third place the casting is good. Larry Crabbe makes a likable hero, doing all the required cowboy cut-ups with an undeniable dash. Marsha Hunt is the gal whom he saves from a fate worse than death—in this case the loss of her family's ranch to a shyster lawyer. Ray Hatton comes through with some good comedy and a couple of wisecracks that deserve framing. Grant Withers has another chance for some rough stuff and delivers with a punch. If you're a rodeo enthusiast or just crazy over horses, you'll find some scenes of trick riding and round-ups highly entertaining and exceptionally well photographed.

★ Trailin' West (Warners)

We can't decide whether to call this a poor historical picture or a poor western. Let's say it's a little of both and let it go at that. The Civil War provides an excuse for extra gun-play while Abraham Lincoln and Dick Foran motivate the action. Dick finds himself with a secret service job to sleuth out the gold shipment situation. He is sent trailin' West and has himself one grand time rescuing papers stolen from him, gold shipments and ladies in distress. There are Indians, too, if you like that sort of thing. Dick Foran plays the role with such enthusiasm that he manages to lend credence to it. Paula Stone does the best she can under the circumstances. Eddie Schubert takes top acting honors with Robert Barrat, as Abraham Lincoln, running a close second.

Now there's a third member of the Kibbee tribe in the fillums. It's Milt Kibbee, Jr., son of Milt Kibbee, brother of Guy and also a member of the cast on this one. . . . Dick Foran was kept busy changing from cowboy costume to evening clothes. He was playing in "Public Enemy's Wife" at the same time and would rush madly from location at Chatsworth at noon every day to the Warner studio in town to play the playboy millionaire all afternoon. Dick much prefers Westerns, however, in spite of being voted one of the best-dressed lads to graduate from Princeton.

★ Ticket to Paradise

(Republic)

If you run into this picture at your neighborhood theatre you'll not feel gypped. There are a lot of laughs and that's something after all. The story concerns Roger Pryor's predicament when he becomes involved in a taxi crack-up and comes through alive with nothing on his mind but taxis. Roger really had several other things on his mind before, including steel contracts. But Wendy Barrie gives him something else to think about. She's madly in love with him, too, but Uncle Claude Gillingwater puts his expensively shod foot down and flatly refuses to listen to wedding bells. So Roger and Wendy set about proving that the Pryors are good enough for anybody even if they are rather vague on just what Roger might have been. Their efforts almost drive Uncle to an early and scandalous grave before all is beautifully cleared up. You will want to see more of Claude Gillingwater after his capable handling of this role, and you will find the leading characters good comedians. Luis Alberni, E. E. Clive and John Sheehan deserve mention in minor roles.

Preview Postscript

E. E. Clive is an old hand at pictures, having completed his 1,139th role with this one. He's done everything from slap-stick comedy to Shakespearean tragedies, besides operating many theatres both here and in England. At one time he ran the Los Angeles Biltmore and the Hollywood Playhouse. Mr. Clive was the originator of the portable theatre which made one-night stands all over the British Isles. This idea was hatched just after his graduation from the University of Wales and Mr. C. says it was about time he had an idea, having not entertained a thought for four years. . . . Claude Gillingwater and Roger Pryor had had more than a grand reunion when they met on the set of this picture. Over thirty-four years ago, Gillingwater had known Roger's father, Arthur Pryor, very well, and had often bounced Roger on his knee.

★ And Sudden Death

(Paramount)

After buying the provocative title of last year's absorbing essay on the death that rides with reckless drivers, Paramount went sissy and turned out a picture which lacks all the hard-boiled qualities which gave the essay its merit. "And Sudden Death" is a meek little affair about a handsome police officer, a haughty society girl and her weak-kneed brother. Randolph Scott is a representative of the law who is something of a crusader against careless driving. He arrests Frances Drake, to whom speed laws mean nothing due to the fact that her father is a wealthy and influential business man. The handsome cop and the expensive lady fall in love, and she promises to keep an eye on her speedometer. Returning from a party one evening with her drunken younger brother (Tom Brown) she is involved in an accident which costs the lives of several children. Frances goes to jail, refusing to tell that her brother was at the wheel at the time of the accident. The thing preys on the brother's mind until he finally drives his car off an embankment and confesses all on his deathbed.

Preview Postscript

This proved to be one of the most costly productions in some time as far as "props" were concerned. Twenty-two cars were smashed to smithereens before the director felt satisfied with the effects. One was a heavy sedan which was driven through a rail and smashed up—all of which was a real accident, since it had not been the intention of the company to crash up that car a-tall. A broken car, patched up to make an elegant appearance, had been assigned the role. But arriving on location, it refused to budge; the cost of the day's production was too high to wait for another, so the good car was immediately purchased from a cameraman and sent to its death. . . . The city of Los Angeles permitted the use of Griffith Park for many location scenes, allowing white lines to be painted on roads, fences built, etc. The California Highway Patrol helped stage many of the crashes and safety agents coöperated with brake tests, highway gadgets, traffic signals, etc. There were no accidents during the making of this picture, an unusual record for a celluloider of this type. A specially constructed glass was used in all the crash scenes to protect the passengers in the cars and heavy clothing and padding were worn by them to lessen the shocks. In Hollywood there are five or six men and women who make an excellent living by doing all the stunts that you see in movies—car crashes, parachute jumps, burning building jumps, etc., while the stars look on and approve or disapprove.

perturbed about the romantic publicity he received on his recent singing tour. He intimates that girls didn't really pursue him relentlessly, as the newspapers stated, and that he didn't live in mortal fear of being surrounded and carried off by a band of marauding females. He does admit, however, that the ladies were nice to him.

Recent reports of a Garbo-George Brent romance are untrue. MODERN SCREEN employs, at great expense, a staff of Pinkerton men who do nothing but follow Garbo about. We haven't seen any of them, since they're too busy following Garbo, but we have it on excellent authority that up to now Mr. B. has not been a guest at the Garbo domain.

Talked to Bob Taylor over the lunch table at M-G-M a few days after his return from a trip to New York. It was Bob's first glimpse of Broadway, and vice versa. In the struggle, it appears, Broadway came out first, for Bob lost a goodly percentage of the Taylor haberdashery when he was surrounded by enthusiastic fans wherever he made a public appearance. One night he had all the buttons pulled off his coat. And here we've been thinking Hollywood was crazy!

This month's report on the Jean Harlow-Bill Powell romance: Jean and her mother have moved into a small home in Beverly Hills only a few blocks from the Powell mansion. When we suggested she was gradually moving in on Mr. P. she denied it and told us she simply liked the neighborhood. Incidentally, her former home was sold to Nat Levine, the producer, for $80,000. And the new home—Heaven forbid—doesn't even have a swimming pool. It's that simple and unpretentious.

The publicity department at RKO-Radio would have you believe that Bert Wheeler and Bob Woolsey are acting as their own technical advisers on their current picture "Mummy's Boys." Says the press dept.: "Much of the action in the picture is laid in Egypt. Two years ago when the pair of comics was on a tour of the world, they flew into Cairo and spent three days in that historic region. When questions of a technical nature arise, Director Fred Guiol calls upon either Wheeler or Woolsey for advice." And gets it, no doubt.

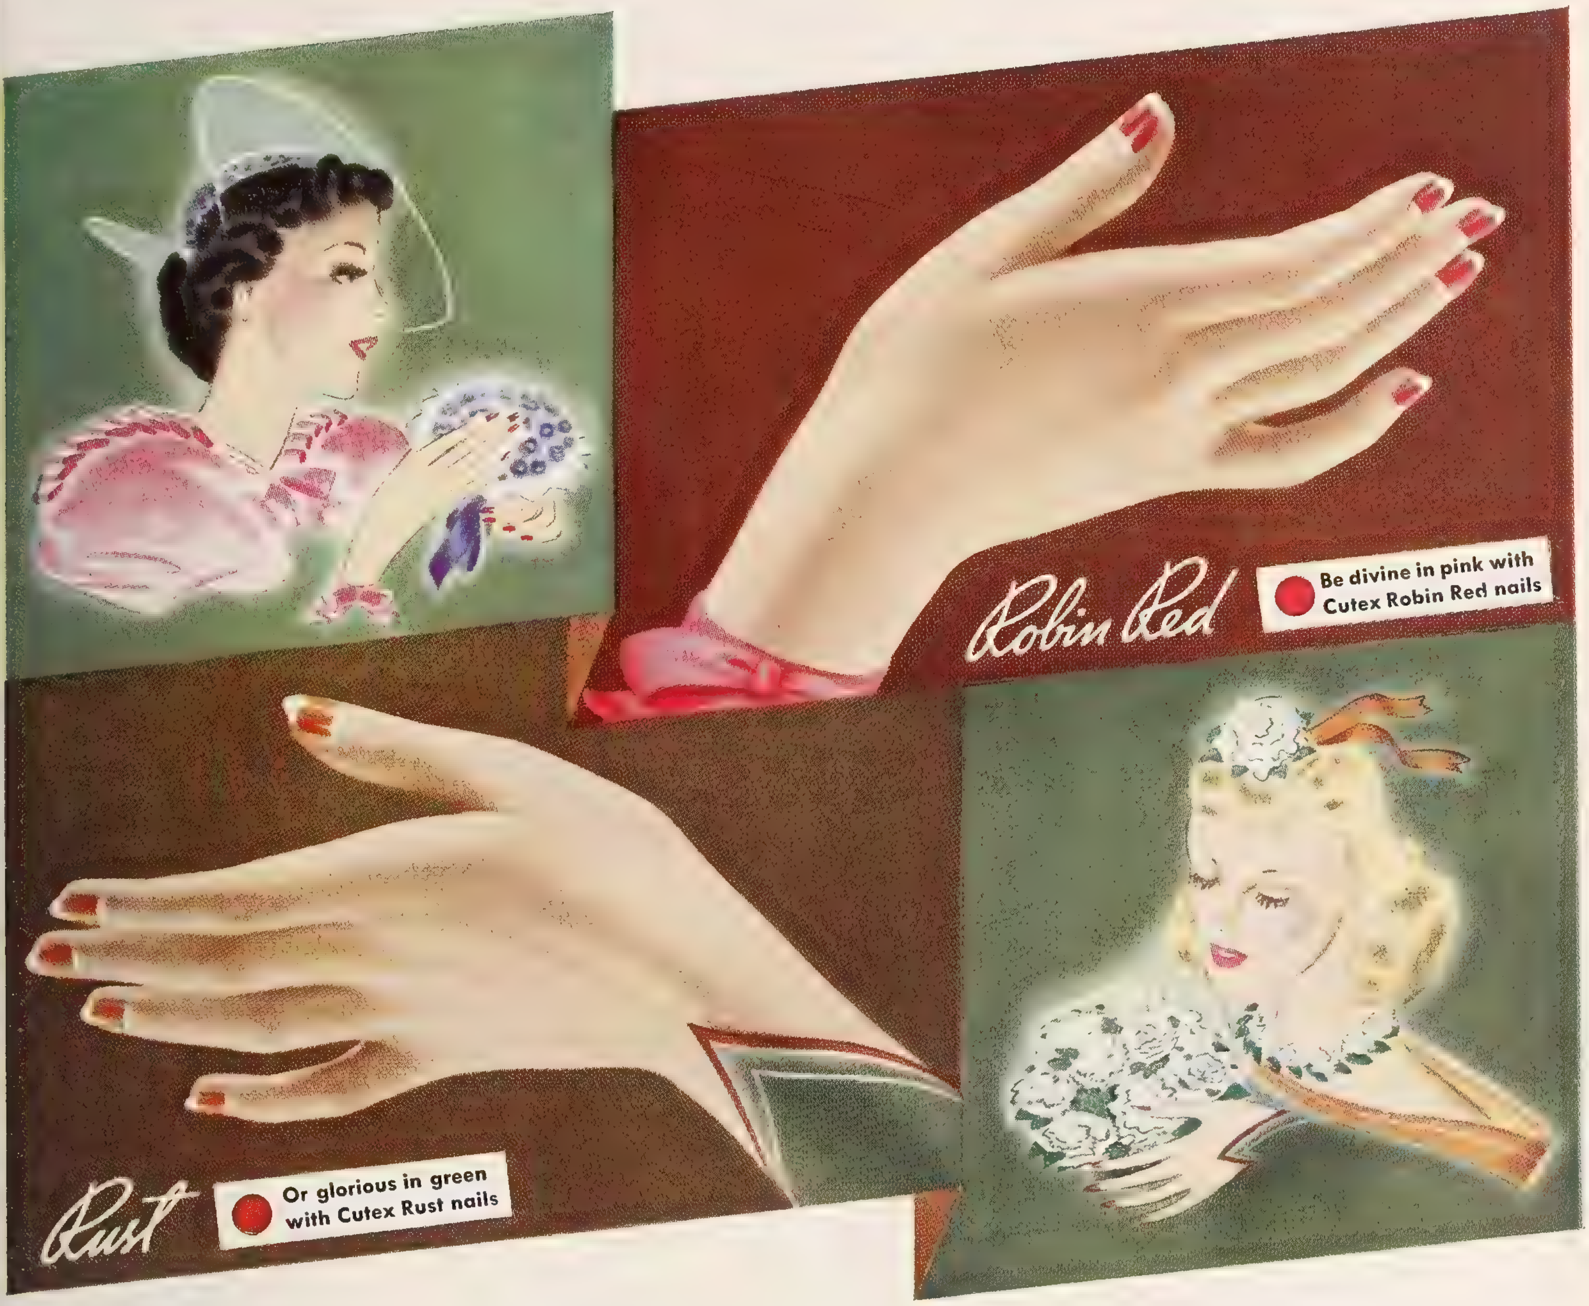
BRIDESMAIDS AT 2 SMART LONG ISLAND WEDDINGS

Chose these new "Smoky" nail shades



Robin Red
Be divine in pink with Cutex Robin Red nails
Rust
Or glorious in green with Cutex Rust nails

IF there's one place where a color scheme is thought out as carefully as a symphony—it's at a wedding. So it's extra significant that bridesmaids at two recent Long Island weddings chose the new Cutex Robin Red and Rust!

Cutex Robin Red is a new smoky red that really does go with everything. Even girls who are afraid of deep reds will like it. It's just enough accent for pale colors, not too gay with white, and goes wonderfully with deep, rich browns and greens.

Cutex Rust is a grand new color. A subtle, smoky Sun-Tan shade, it's fascinating with brown, green, gray, yellow—and never looks garish on sun-tanned hands!

If you're conservative, you can still be beautiful. Cutex Rose is divine with all pastels, and gets along beautifully with all the bright, "difficult" colors so popular in the summer.

These three shades will give every dress you own that up-to-the-minute look!

And don't forget, the new Cutex formula is a stronger, finer lacquer that resists fading in the sun and holds its true color for days. It's more economical, too, because it doesn't thicken . . . it's usable right down to the last drop in the bottle!

All 9 lovely Cutex shades are correct—created by the World's Manicure Authority. They go on smoothly, stay on, never crack or peel. At your favorite shop—35¢. Cutex Lipstick to harmonize—50¢.

"A Social Crime!"

"A Splendid Idea!"

SAYS MODERN DENTIST

A SOCIALITE AND A DENTIST CLASH OVER A LAMB CHOP

(But the civilized way to build firm gums is IPANA and MASSAGE)

YOU'RE RIGHT—quite right. This is a social crime! The girl is a barbarian—a social outlaw! But before you dismiss her—before you turn the page—listen to the frank opinion of a modern dentist.

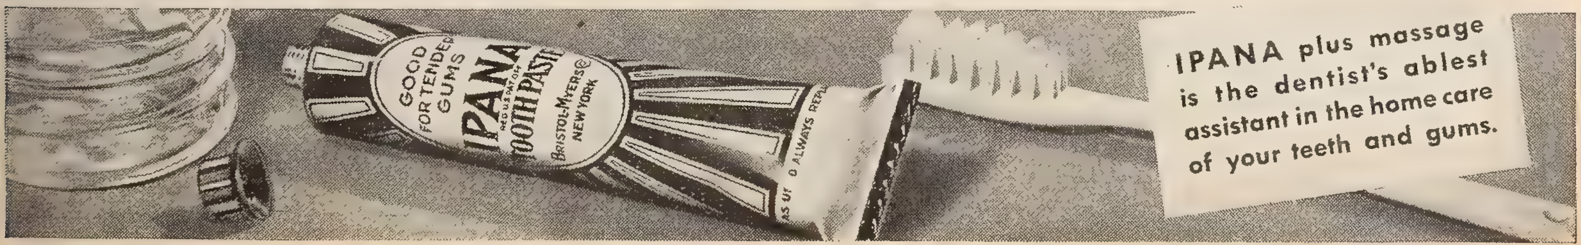
"A crime? Nonsense! I hope millions of people see this picture! It may be shocking to some people but, from my professional viewpoint, it's a perfect lesson in the proper care of the teeth and gums. If more people chewed as vigorously, there would be a lot less evidence of tender, ailing gums—of that serious dental warning—'pink tooth brush'."

Today's soft foods rob our gums of the vigorous chewing they need for sturdy health. Denied this natural work and exercise, they grow flabby, tender, sensitive! And when they signal that sensitiveness, when they flash that warning "tinge of pink"—see your dentist.

"Pink tooth brush" doesn't always mean that you are in for serious trouble—but your dentist should be the judge. Usually it only means gums underworked and over-sensitive—gums that need exercise—gums that will quickly respond to the healthful stimulation of Ipana Tooth Paste and massage.

It is very simple to rub a little extra Ipana into your gums every time you brush your teeth. You'll soon feel a tingle of new circulation—new life. Gums look better, feel firmer. They show a grateful response to this new stimulation. For Ipana is especially made to benefit your gums as well as clean your teeth.

Young or old—play safe. Even before you have a first warning of danger, adopt this modern dental health routine. You'll certainly be far safer from the really serious gum troubles.



IPANA plus massage is the dentist's ablest assistant in the home care of your teeth and gums.

The stars vacation in New York!

BY MACK HUGHES

DESPITE THE fact that the thermometer continues to reach new early Fall heights, movie stars travel across the country to visit the greatest resort in the world—New York.

Look at Robert Taylor. Most any girl would. For his very first vacation, he chose gay Gotham. Never before having been east of Beatrice, Nebraska, it was still no problem for him to know where to spend the idle moments his studio allowed him.

However, no sooner was Bob settled in his tower suite at the Waldorf-Astoria than the fun began! First of all, there were interviews—and Bob confides that they scare him plenty, because he doesn't ever seem to know what to say or when to say it. There was that young woman from one of the trade papers, for instance. She was neither impressed nor at a loss of words when meeting a celebrity.

Taylor confided with a broad grin, "The first thing she asked was, 'How long do you think your luck will hold out? Do you expect to get by on your looks forever—or do you intend to learn to act'?"

With a twinkle in his eye, Bob admitted he wasn't so sure his luck, if any, would hold out, but he had high hopes of learning to act. "Take Gary Cooper," he explained. "There's the handsomest man you could find, and he certainly has made the grade. And look at Clark Gable. But then Gable was an actor before he went into pictures, so perhaps he doesn't count. Maybe I'll have to trust that my luck will hold out until I can really give a perfect performance."

The fan interest was so great in Bob Taylor's presence in New York that his hotel management installed a figurative finger print system for admission to his suite. Not only did people congregate outside his hotel, but one (Continued on page 99)

By MARY ROBERTS RINEHART

IT WAS a strange title for a book, "Valiant Is the Word for Carrie," so when it came out some months ago I sent out and got it, and I read it through at one sitting.

Women are often brave, perhaps always brave; but to be valiant implies also gallantry and an indomitable spirit. And here were both a valiant woman and a remarkable story, the woman an outcast and a pariah in a small Louisiana town, but humorous and generous, the story one of pure courage and sturdy regeneration. It was evident that there was a great motion picture here. Carrie had no illusions. If the French half of her was cautious the Irish half would dare anything, and had. But the picture began, of course, when one day a small boy with two buckeyes in a treasure box wandered into that secret garden of hers and told her she was not bad; and Carrie promptly fell in love with him.

Here was everything for a picture, humor and pathos and deep human understanding. There was nothing mawkish about Carrie. Sometimes she told herself she was crazy, and sometimes that she was an old fool, but her love for this boy and later on for a small waif of a girl is the very essence of womanhood. For the time came when Carrie had to plan so that she could face them both without shame, and the picture is a story of that struggle.

I intend to see the picture, of course. I want to see Carrie leaving behind her Cemetery Road and the easy money of her past, and escaping into a life where as she says she will go straight if she has to sling dishes in a restaurant. And I want to see her with her waifs that incongruous three against the world, and watch them slowly and successfully conquering that world. Also I want to see Gladys George as Carrie. I know her work, which is that of a fine dramatic artist, and her own story, which is one of ups and downs, and for a long time mostly downs.

SHE HAS a long record of achievement behind her. She narrowly escaped being born in a theater, for her parents were actors. She was on the stage herself at the age of three, and as a youngster in small towns paraded the streets with a sandwich board which said: "Wouldn't you like to see me tonight at ——— Theater?" It is quite typical of her life that she got her first real chance while nursing a badly broken nose, and not surprising that after almost seven hundred riotously successful appearances as the star of "Personal Appearance," some one took a plane and signed her up for Carrie in this picture.

She will play it with skill, understanding and honesty, for Carrie was always honest, even with herself. But above all she will play it as she has lived, valiantly, with courage and an indomitable spirit.

GLADYS GEORGE, famous American actress, who makes her screen debut in Paramount's "Valiant Is the Word for Carrie," with Arline Judge, John Howard, Harry Carey, Dudley Digges, William Collier, Sr., Isabel Jewel, Charlene Wyatt, Jackie Moran, Maude Eburne, from Barry Benefield's best seller, produced and directed by WESLEY RUGGLES.

What was sacrifice to her, if it could bring them happiness?

A tender love scene from "To Mary—With Love," co-starring those favorites, Warner Baxter and Myrna Loy. It's sure-fire entertainment. Put it on your "must" list.

. . . A TOUR OF TODAY'S TALKIES

BY LEO TOWNSEND

★★★★ Romeo and Juliet (M-G-M)

Once more Hollywood brings Shakespeare to the picture houses for what is hopped will be a happy meeting between Avon's bard and the paying customers. On the whole, "Romeo and Juliet" is an earnest effort to put Shakespeare on film. It's a lavish production, done with taste and an eye for beauty. The Shakespearean verse is ably handled by most of the cast and the effect, after listeners become accustomed to it, is pleasing. The romance of old Verona, in the hands of Norma Shearer and Leslie Howard, is often compelling and beautiful to watch. Miss Shearer's "Juliet" is more adequate than brilliant. At times her reading is excellent, but there are moments when her limited voice range fails to give her lines the majesty and beauty that were written into them. Leslie Howard's "Romeo" is played with more restraint than one would expect of the headstrong and dashing young Montagu, but his performance makes up in polish what it lacks in excitement. Of the supporting cast, the outstanding players are Edna May Oliver as the nurse, Basil Rathbone as Tybalt, C. Aubrey Smith as Lord Capulet and John Barrymore as Mercutio. George Cukor's direction is excellent and it, perhaps, goes without saying that Mr. Shakespeare's script leaves nothing to be desired.

For ten years M-G-M has been planning to film "Romeo and Juliet." Not a word in the screen play has been used that is not Shakespeare. Oliver Messel, an Englishman, was brought over to aid in the designing of costumes. Messel spent two months in Verona, Italy, studying, sketching and photographing works of art, architecture, costumes and hairdresses in museums. Every important work of art of the Fifteenth Century was photographed, and when completed the studio had a library of almost ten thousand photographs. From the countless pictures taken in Verona, Cedric Gibbons, head of the art department at the studio, constructed a city of clay in miniature. From this beginning grew the final elaborate sets used on the lot as the film's background. Five hundred women were employed for several months to create the 1,250 costumes which the picture demanded. So intricate were the fashions of the period that many of the costumes required countless yards of hand stitching. A hundred and fifty tailors found several months' employment working on the men's costumes, which in many instances needed entire hand work also.

★★★ To Mary—With Love (20th Century-Fox)

This is one of the most pleasant bits of screen entertainment this season has offered. It might be mentioned right now that Mary is Myrna Loy, which should be good news to the ten million Loy addicts around the country. With a performance that measures up to her work in "The Thin Man," Miss Loy, with the help of the deft direction of John Cromwell, makes this a picture which should—if you'll pardon the phrase—go on everyone's "must" list. The story paints the adventures of a married couple against a background of the past decade—from the Dempsey-Tunney fight and the Lindbergh flight through the crisis of 1929 and up to now. It doesn't particularly attempt to trace social developments during that period, but it presents a thoroughly engrossing picture of what the period (Continued on page 12)

THE PICTURE OF THE YEAR!

● Screen history will remember 1936 as the year of Warner Bros.' herculean picturization of "Anthony Adverse." In sheer physical grandeur and emotional immensity, here is a picture that dominates the screen of the year as completely as Hervey Allen's mighty novel dominated the world's bookshelf in its two-year reign at the top of the best-sellers. Reader millions who called it impossible to film will now acclaim it as impossible to describe—as it sweeps through three heroic generations, across the turbulent frontiers of three continents, to pack highlights of the 495,000 most exciting words ever put on paper into 2¼ hours of high-tension entertainment. The supreme adventure of your movie-going career awaits you in—

● Another "Anthony Adverse" would have to be written to catalogue all that is to be seen in the 412 scenes of the photoplay. Accurate description seems beyond the power of words. It is, like all miracles, a thing that must be seen to be believed—a crushing answer to those who said a picture could never be made equal to the book.

The novel Hervey Allen turned hermit four years to write was read 11 times by Sheridan Gibney in planning the screen play . . . 17,437 fans wrote letters asking Warner Bros. to give Fredric March the title role . . . Sets were built in duplication of scenes in France, Italy, Switzerland, Cuba, Africa and America . . . Myrna Loy and Warner Baxter were photographed watching the Dempsey-Tunney fight at Philadelphia! This is how that feat was accomplished: The studio obtained newsreel prints of the fight, and "rear projected" these pictures on a screen in back of the players, who moved as they would ordinarily. The regular studio camera then photographed the whole thing. . . . No mishaps marred this production's 34-day schedule, although Myrna Loy's cold, caught two days after she began work, threatened progress for a while. Finding herself getting hoarse, she had a recording of her voice made before and after the cold, and evened the difference by pitching her lines a few tones higher. She spent most of her spare time on the set, as usual, reading deep and heavy tomes. When not engaged in that she was busy knitting jink afghans. . . . Warner Baxter spent most of his time gazing into space, dreaming about the north woods vacation he was going to take right after the last shot on the flicker was made.

★★★ Rhythm on the Range (Paramount)

This flicker combines a Western drama with a set of swell songs and emerges as first-rate entertainment. In fact, it might be mentioned in passing that, judging by Mr. Crosby's avoirdupois, Paramount should have put him on horseback a couple of years ago. Off to a slow start, "Rhythm on the Range" gathers momentum just about the time Martha Raye arrives on the screen. Martha Raye is a comedy songstress whose debut in pictures is, to put it mildly, terrific. She's a grand comedienne with a style all her own. Fortunately, the producers have teamed her up with Bob Burns, the Arkansas Philosopher of radio renown, and the two of them walk away with the show. Song hits include "Empty Saddles," "I Can't Escape from You" and two grand comedy numbers, "You'll Have to Swing It" and "I'm an Old Cowhand from the Rio Grande." In the supporting cast are Frances Farmer, Lucille Gleason, George E. Stone, Warren Hymer, James Burke and a bull with soulful eyes whose name is Cuddles.

Bing Crosby had two friends visiting him while on location. They came up for the fishing and were determined to get some in spite of bait being a big problem. They finally decided on grasshoppers, so Bing and his friends set out one morning armed with flat paddles, intending to swat down some bait. Bing swears he chased one fellow clear to Bishop before getting anything to swat. Discouraged, the fishermen returned to the hotel, remarking that they would pay a nickel apiece to get some of those grasshoppers. Next morning, bright and early, Bing was awakened by a loud rapping on his bedroom door. Standing outside were two of the natives, carrying large paper sacks. They had taken the fishermen at their word and had $9.45 worth of grasshoppers on hand. The real pay-off, however, came when Bing was requested to work all day, for the company was leaving that night for Hollywood. . . . The first "blessed event" to occur in front of a camera was another distressing situation. A pastoral scene of great beauty had just been photographed at the cost of considerable time and effort. So perfect was it that the director took a good long scene of it and was just going to call "cut" when from behind a tree strolled a cow and proceeded to produce its calf.

★★★ Pepper (20th Century-Fox)

"Pepper," you may have guessed, is none other than our friend, Jane Withers. Here she's the Tomboy Terror, leader of a toughie gang from the slums. Jane has her busiest time to date keeping widows and orphans happy, crabby millionaires pleasant, and their spoiled daughters glad to marry policemen instead of foreign nocounts. The children will simply love every breathless moment of it and the oldsters will be entertained, albeit a bit weary before the final tomato is thrown. For the plot practically hangs on the aforementioned fruit, what with Pepper's gang depending solely on them as ammunition for getting what they want. And they want plenty. Irvin S. Cobb gets a role this time that suits him admirably—that of the moneyed grouch who has suffered from indigestion for years and is cured by Pepper and fourteen hot dogs. Slim Summerville makes an excellent street-sweeper (with a lot more to do in the picture, however, than that) and Ivan Lebedeff couldn't be improved upon as just a gigolo. Muriel Robert is attractive in the unattractive role of a spoiled darling, and Dean Jagger is the handsome cop who finally wins her expensive heart.

PIMPLES are often a real calamity to girls and boys after the beginning of adolescence—from about 13 to 25 years of age, or even longer.

During this period, important glands develop and final growth takes place. This causes disturbances throughout the entire system. The skin becomes oversensitive. Waste poisons in the blood irritate this sensitive skin. Pimples break out.

Fleischmann's fresh Yeast is an effective remedy for adolescent pimples. It clears these skin irritants out of the blood. Then—with the cause removed—the pimples vanish!

Eat 3 cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast regularly—a cake about one-half hour before each meal. Eat it plain, or in a little water until your skin is entirely clear. Start today.

Modern Screen's Medal-Award picture, "The Gorgeous Hussy," a Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer production, reviewed by Leo Townsend

"The Gorgeous Hussy" covers that robust period in our nation's youth when Daniel Webster and John Randolph matched oratory on the Senate floor, when Andrew Jackson became the seventh President of the United States, when a pretty woman became the unofficial First Lady of the Land.

"The Gorgeous Hussy" presents Washington in the first half of the Nineteenth Century, when America struggled vainly to remain a union. John Randolph, valiant defender of States' Rights, crossed verbal swords with Daniel Webster, the Senator from Massachusetts who, as Washington small-talk had it, was born "with a silver constitution in his mouth." Homespun Andy Jackson, with his pipe-smoking wife, arrives in the Capitol to take his seat in the Senate and remains to guide the nation's destiny.

All this is threaded together by the presence of Peggy O'Neale, pretty daughter of an innkeeper whose hostelry is the home of Randolph, Webster and Jackson. Peggy is in love with John Randolph and devoted to Andy Jackson. However, she marries a young naval lieutenant, "Bow" Timberlake. After his death, Peggy gives all of her time to Andrew Jackson.

On the eve of his ascendancy to the presidency, Jackson's wife dies. Since Peggy is his closest friend in Washington, she virtually becomes First Lady during the stormy Jackson administration. Her devotion to him is so great that she gives up a planned marriage to John Randolph because of differences of opinion on national policies, and becomes the bride of John Eaton.

Although it has been given a magnificent production, "The Gorgeous Hussy" is distinguished mainly by its acting. As Andrew Jackson, Lionel Barrymore may be said to carry off first honors. Joan Crawford, in the role of Peggy O'Neale, should win herself new followers. Excellent also are Beulah Bondi as Mrs. Jackson, Melvyn Douglas as John Randolph, Robert Taylor as "Bow" Timberlake, Franchot Tone as John Eaton, Sidney Toler as Daniel Webster, and James Stewart as a young newspaper man.

short cuts to sweet success

Maureen O'Sullivan may use old-fashioned recipes, but her kitchen and kitchen equipment are decidedly modern, as the electric waffle iron she's using above indicates. (Right) The recipe for making these delectable cream puffs, with custard filling, is yours for the asking.

BY MARJORIE DEEN

ARE YOU equipped to be a charming hostess and an efficient housekeeper? Well, it's just too bad if you're not, according to Maureen O'Sullivan. She feels that there are so many modern and comparatively inexpensive ways to improve your entertaining and homemaking technique that a woman is foolish, indeed, who ignores them.

"I'm still enough of a daughter of Old Ireland to revere tradition in many things," winsome little Maureen informed me across the tea table.

"I want to have little treasures around the house," she continued, "that have mellowed with age and that I cherish because of association. But I must say that when it comes to the way a home is run, I like to see things being done in the most modern way imaginable. However, short-cuts and modern methods are but the means to an end for there can be no modern substitute for old-fashioned hospitality and old-fashioned foods. Why, I've yet to have my fill of Old-Fashioned Chocolate Cake—a traditional American favorite that I've adopted with the greatest enthusiasm."

Then Maureen went on to describe some of the other foods that she has discovered over here, while we were busy "discovering" what an unaffected actress and sweet person is this little colleen. Being one of the few stars in Hollywood who does not have to watch her diet, she was not afraid to mention sweets as her favorite foods.

All sorts and varieties of cake, I was told, appear with great frequency on the O'Sullivan table. But the chocolate cake already mentioned and a delectable Chocolate Marshmallow Roll meet with the highest praises of hostess and guests alike. Great favorites, also, when company comes, are Cream Puffs—light, golden, home-made shells, filled with a smooth custard cream.

I was able to get the recipes for all three—which you'll find in this month's Modern Hostess leaflet. The coupon at the end of this article will bring you a free copy of this little leaflet, promptly. If you've never written in for one before, you have a treat in store for you. This month, for instance, I'm sure you'll agree immediately that the sweets just mentioned sound good. Then when you receive your attractively printed copy you'll discover that the recipes given you by Maureen are so easy to follow that they practically guarantee perfect results.

You don't have to know how to cook to be an expert in the kitchen, claims Maureen O'Sullivan. What's more, she proves it!

"Maids may come and maids may go," Maureen informed me laughingly, as she gave me the recipes to copy down, "but woe betide any servant who can't turn out a delicious product by following the directions I give her for making my favorite desserts."

I'M NOT a cook myself," Maureen admitted, "but I'm an expert with a good waffle batter and waffle iron. Crisp, crunchy waffles with plenty of butter and syrup always make a hit. And put this down for your readers: the syrup should be heated so that when you pour it on hot, it melts the butter and doesn't chill the waffle. That suggestion was made to me by a Vermont fan when she sent me a large jar of her state's famous product. I've followed her advice religiously ever since! Try it, yourself, and see if you don't think it's an improvement. Banana waffles with whipped cream are a great idea, too, especially for card-party luncheons. I'll let you have my two favorite waffle recipes, if you'd care to have them."

Would I care to have them? Why, I practically grabbed them in my anxiety to find something new to make in my waffle iron. And how about you? Well, you'll find one of the waffle recipes in the leaflet and the other one at the end of this article, so be sure to try them.

"For an informal Sunday evening supper or an after-a-preview party," Miss O'Sullivan continued, "I like to place one of the attractive, modern toaster trays on one corner of the buffet. The little glass dishes that fit into the tray are then filled with condiments and different spreads —some TODAY, the doctor studies "Prevention" as closely as anything in his profession. He tries to guard his patients from even a single error which may affect their health.

Before approving a laxative, for instance, he sets up a strict standard of requirements which must be fully met. This code is printed below, point by point. And every point is important to your welfare.

WHAT DOCTORS DEMAND OF A LAXATIVE:

It should be dependable.
It should be mild and gentle.
It should be thorough.

It should not form a habit.
It should not over-act.
It should not cause stomach pains.
It should not nauseate or upset digestion.

Bob Taylor letters win cash prizes

It's Bob Taylor month, girls, and are the letters hot! Because of the deluge of mail about Mr. T., we have devoted these columns to him exclusively.

Bob Taylor—Prince Charming

Hollywood is indeed a veritable Wonderland when it can manufacture a Robert Taylor overnight. Not even in story books has there been a Prince Charming to equal him. He is Youth in all its glory—slender, graceful, handsome, and intelligent. His youth is the youth that Johann Strauss tried to depict for us in his beautiful waltzes. Mr. Taylor has the power to bring his Youth to every member of his audience.

Hollywood seems to take pride in the fact that it is growing up, that it will soon be on a par with the legitimate stage. But I think the cinema and the stage will always be miles apart, one is real and the other is a shadow. While the producers are spending millions buying up stage productions, M-G-M has a goldmine right in its own back yard. I venture to say that Bob Taylor in the cheapest, simplest little story will make more money for his producers than the million-dollar reproduction of a stage play.—Bessie Bennett, Philadelphia, Pa.

Bob Taylor—Clothes Horse

I saw Mr. Taylor in "Broadway Melody" and like many other enthusiastic moviegoers, I left the theatre raving. When the second Taylor film came to town, I left the theatre a trifle skeptical. Bob Taylor was just too pretty and, as yet hadn't done any real acting. After Mr. T-s ensuing films, I left the theatre tired—yes, tired. Tired of gazing at a slick-looking fellow whose attire was always faultless, upon whose head not one beautiful hair was ever misplaced, and whose acting was invariably done to the tune of moonlight and the glamorous background of a rich man's playboy son.

So, to whom it may concern, there is my opinion of this excellent clothes horse. Until Robert Taylor proves that he can measure up to the standards of a real actor; until I can see his handsome pan slightly messed up; I remain the self-appointed president of the Anti-Robert Taylor and the Like Club.—Lollie Earley, Little Rock, Ark.

Bob Taylor—Rare Diamond

Let us take the case of Robert Taylor, the present heart-breaker and leading idol of the screen. Here is a personable fellow—straight of profile and clear of tongue. His are the attributes of stardom or that which the movie moguls call "box office." Yet they stupidly persist in casting him as a lollygagging lover and wrapping him in stories having an unmistakable odor. That

Bob Taylor—Unbearable

I suppose I'm very odd, in fact you may think I'm phenomenal, but I am not a Robert Taylor fan! Definitely not! In fact, I can't stand his stupid, sissy-fied characterizations and thus I avoid his pictures altogether. Perfect lover? Best looking actor? Rot! In my eyes, he is unbearable.

But—a large one—there is someone on the screen who fulfills my highest ideals of manliness, whose sincere portrayals have found a place in my heart, whose subtle humor intrigues me, whose six feet, three inches of boyish good looks causes ecstatic admiration from me. Who is this perfect male? None other than Fred MacMurray.—M. M. M., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Bob Taylor—Second Gable

Here's an idea! Since Robert Taylor is being called the "second Clark Gable," and since both he and Gable are under contract to M-G-M, how about a picture starring both of them? The fans would have an opportunity to see both these stars at one time and so would be better able to judge for themselves whether or not Bob deserves such billing. Imagine what this would mean at the box-office: Clark Gable and Robert Taylor, in the same film, and contending for the affections of, say, Myrna Loy or Loretta Young. Why don't you Between You and Me-ers suggest what leading lady you would prefer for each of these gents?—O. Oneal, San Diego, Calif.

Those asked most frequently and the most interesting ones receive first preference. And not too many at a time, please. Address: The Information Desk, Modern Screen, 149 Madison Ave., New York, N. Y.

NOTE: The following biographies are printed by popular demand. They are the ones most frequently requested during the last month by readers who have sent in the coupon at the end of the article. Each coupon has been tabulated, so if you have requested any of these, kindly consider yours automatically responsible.

ROBERT TAYLOR: Dr. S. A. Brugh's little boy with the big name, Spangler Arlington Brugh, has very definitely "arrived." In fact, Bob Taylor, as we're fortunately allowed to call him, is Fan Favorite No. 1. Born in Filley, Neb., on August 5, he later moved to Beatrice where he attended school. He had two years of college work at Doane, Neb., then finished his course at Pomona College, where, in addition to his outstanding dramatic work, he was a star tennis player. A role in the campus production of "Journey's End" won Bob a screen test, which was so bad that he was promptly sent back to his books. However, after graduation, Bob was given another test, signed to a contract and put into training by M-G-M. He played bit parts in a couple of big productions, leading roles in several little theatre plays, was loaned to Fox for "Handy Andy" in 1934 and finally made good in "Society Doctor." Tennis and horseback riding are his favorite sports, he plays the cello and piano, collects sweaters and is very superstitious about black cats and ladders. Six feet tall, he weighs 165 pounds and has brown hair and blue eyes. Bob owns a collie dog named Sport, his only pet. "The Gorgeous Hussy," with Joan Crawford, is our hero's latest, and he's now working on "Camille" with the great Garbo. Perhaps the love scenes in "His Brother's Wife" between Bob and Barbara Stanwyck were more realistic than usual. Anyway, Miss Stanwyck has been his feminine lead off the screen these many months. 'Tis said to be serious. You may write Mr. Taylor at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Washington Blvd., Culver City, Calif. If you want his photograph, be sure to send 25¢ along with your request—this is the standard price charged by the stars to cover printing and mailing.

ALLETA MILLER, Orlando, Fla.—You win! Alice Faye has never been married, much less to Rudy Vallee. Rudy's ex-wife is Fay Webb, which is probably why your friends were confused.

JANE WITHERS: This talented screen rascal was born in Atlanta, Ga., to Mr. and Mrs. Walter E. Withers, on April 12, 1926. By the time she was 4, Miss Jane was Atlanta's child Garbo. She was featured in "The Toyland Review" and for two years was heard over the air on Station WGST, during which time she was learning French and Spanish, and taking to horseback riding. All hopeful, the family took their youngster to Hollywood, where they searched 7 long months for an assignment for her. A bit part in "Handle with Care" came in 1932, followed by other minute roles. Then nothing. So Jane returned to radio work and was starred in KFWB's "Juvenile Review," in which she sang and swapped gags with the M.C. Her ability to do impersonations—she can do over 40—as well as her skill at singing, landed her the "brat" part in "Bright Eyes," and a contract. Off-screen Jane is a wholesome little girl, full of personality and mischief. She likes swimming and skating, and her love of pets has caused her to accumulate a small menagerie. This brown-eyed, brown-haired, lovable imp is 4 feet 6 inches tall and weighs 68 pounds. Her next picture is "Pepper" to be followed by a musical, "Can This Be Dixie?" with Helen Wood and Thomas Beck. Under contract to 20th Century-Fox Studios, Box 900, Beverly Hills, Calif., you may write her there.

DOROTHY MILLER, Milledgeville, Ga.—Yes, Michael Bartlett did rather drop off the face of the earth for a spell. But he's popped up again as Marion Talley's leading man in Republic's "Follow Your Heart," which should be released shortly.

NELSON EDDY: His is a success story that IS a success story, and a long one to boot. Born in Providence, R. I., on June 29, 1901, the son of Isobel Kendrick and William Darius Eddy, both excellent singers, Nelson received his earlier education at the grammar and Normal schools there. Night school and correspondence courses completed it. He held a variety of jobs, among them those of telephone operator, shipping clerk in an iron works, newspaper reporter and copy reader, and finally advertising copy writer. In Providence Nelson had sung as a boy soprano in several churches but it wasn't until he was working on a Philadelphia newspaper that he began to wonder if his baritone voice might not be a means of livelihood. He sang with phonograph records, then took lessons from several prominent instructors in the United States, Paris and Dresden. In 1921 Mr. Eddy made an anonymous debut in "The Marriage Tax"; in 1924 he was singing with the Philadelphia Civic Opera Company; in 1931 he made a sensational New York debut; and in 1933 gave a concert in Los Angeles at which he received 18 encores. Screen tests were the outcome of this concert, and he was assigned minor roles in "Broadway to Hollywood," "Dancing Lady," "Student Tour" and was finally starred in "Naughty Marietta" and "Rose Marie." Six feet tall, he weighs 173 pounds and derives pleasure from swimming, motoring, tennis, dancing and sailing. He has blue eyes and blonde hair. Mr. Eddy can sing 32 operatic roles and in French, English, Italian, Spanish, Russian and Yiddish. He has never been married and is not engaged. "Maytime," now in production, will be the next Eddy-MacDonald opus. Write him at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Washington Blvd., Culver City, Calif.

MARIE LOUISE, Racine, Wis.—Dick Powell's next picture after "Stage Struck" will be "Gold Diggers of 1937," also with Joan Blondell. Miss Blondell made her screen debut in 1930 in "Sinner's Holiday." Her young son, Norman Scott Barnes, will be 2 years old on November 2nd.

MYRNA LOY: She was originally named Myrna Williams, became Myrna Loy for the movies and on June 27, 1936, became Mrs. Arthur Hornblow, Jr. During the Myrna Williams era she was born in Helena, Mont., where her father was a ranch owner, on August 2, 1905. When she was of high school age her parents brought her to Los Angeles. There she attended the Westlake School for Girls and later an art school. Myrna's ability as a sculptress attracted the attention of Rudolph Valentino and his wife, who gave her a part in "What Price Beauty?" in 1925. She was given other small roles and worked in the stage prologues at Grauman's Theatre in Hollywood, and as a dancer. Her first leading role was in "Renegade" in 1931. That was during her "vamp" days. Things began to look up when Myrna was assigned to "Animal Kingdom," and since that time she has risen to great popularity in straight acting roles. She is 5 feet 5 inches tall, weighs 110 pounds and has titian hair and green eyes. She loves dancing, collects painting and sculpture, swims, plays tennis and rides. Miss Loy plays the piano and likes to read history and biography. Under contract to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Washington Blvd., Culver City, Calif., her next picture will be "Libeled Lady" in which William Powell, Jean Harlow and Spencer Tracy are also cast.

RICHARD I. SMITH, Bellevue, Pa.—The principal players in "Charlie Chan's Courage" were Warner Oland, Drue Leyton, Donald Woods and Paul Harvey. This screen play was by Seton I. Miller. Drue Leyton, Raymond Milland, Mona Barrie, Alan Mowbray, Douglas Walton and E. E. Clive were the more important players with Mr. Oland in "Charlie Chan in London." The most recent Chan picture is "Charlie Chan at the Race Track," but the next has not been announced.

CLARK GABLE: Cadiz, Ohio, was William Clark Gable's birthplace on February 1, 1901. His mother having died in his infancy, Clark was brought up by his step-mother and grandparents. Educated in the Hopedale, Ohio, high school, he went to Akron, where he became a timekeeper in a rubber factory until he caught the "theatre bug" and began playing extra parts on the stage. He then alternated between the theatre and odd jobs. In Portland, Ore., he met Josephine Dillon, diction and elocution instructress, and married her in 1924. In 1927 Clark made his Broadway stage debut and followed it up with a series of other plays. It was in 1929 that he remarried. This was Rhea Langham, a society woman, from whom he is now separated. In 1931 Mr. Gable first appeared on the screen in "The Painted Desert," a Western, but that was only the first step. Look where he is today after a paltry five years! Clark is 6 feet 1 inch tall, weighs 190 pounds, has gray eyes and brown hair and is known as a regular fellow. He likes to watch polo games and football, and his athletic diversions are golf, hunting, fishing, swimming and tennis. He collects firearms, and traveling is his favorite pastime. Clark and Carole Lombard have been palling around a lot lately, and a right nice off-screen team they make, too. Mr. Gable's next film is "Cain and Mabel" in which he is co-starred with Marion Davies, after which he and Joan Crawford are to be teamed in "Love on the Run." Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Washington Blvd., Culver City, Calif., is his address.

JEAN SCHLEUNING, Lincoln, Neb.—Sorry, but the home addresses of the stars are a deep, dark secret. They can be reached through their studios. Humphrey Bogart is married to Mary Phillips. Dick Powell, not Bob Taylor, played with Will Rogers in "Too Busy to Work." Yes, both Mr. Taylor and James Stewart are in "The Gorgeous Hussy" with Joan Crawford, as well as Franchot Tone, Melvyn Douglas and Lionel Barrymore. Some cast!

TRAINS FOR HOLLYWOOD

ROCHELLE HUDSON: This charming Miss hails from the late Will Rogers' home town, Claremore, Okla. Born there on March 6, 1916, she received her education in the Claremore grade school, the Oklahoma City high school and later at the Hollywood high school after her parents moved there. No sooner had Miss H. set foot in cinema city, than she determined to become a film star. After many futile attempts Rochelle signed with RKO in March, 1930, and made "Fanny Foley Herself." Five more RKO films followed, then Rochelle signed with Fox after her success in "Doctor Bull" with Mr. Rogers. Although Miss Hudson had no professional stage experience before entering film work, she had appeared in local performances and had taken dramatic lessons as well as instruction in singing, dancing and painting. Her hobby is hook rugs, she has 2 pet cats, likes to play tennis, swim and read good fiction. She has gray eyes and her favorite color is blue. Miss Hudson is 5 feet 4 inches tall, weighs 100 pounds and has dark brown hair. She is not married. "Poppy," with W. C. Fields, is her most recent picture. Write her at 20th Century-Fox Studios, Box 900, Beverly Hills, Calif.

SALLY THATCHER, San Francisco, Calif.—Michael Whalen played the role of Dr. Luke's son in "The Country Doctor." Craig Reynolds was not in the picture.

JOHN BEAL: Here's another young man with a lengthy real name—John Alexander Blieding. August 13, 1909, was the date of his advent into this world in Joplin, Mo. There he attended grade school and entered whole-heartedly into the high school dramatics. He played leading roles and after school tinkered with settings and lights in the family barn. At the University of Pennsylvania he became an important member of the famous Mask and Wig Club, a dramatic organization. Upon graduation, John went at once to Jasper Deeter's famous Hedgerow Theatre in Pennsylvania. That was in 1930. Next came Broadway and a job as understudy and stage manager, followed by a supporting role in "Wild Waves." In "Another Language" he attracted wide attention and was promptly signed to make his screen debut in the film version of that hit in 1933. In 1934 John appeared in "Hat, Coat and Glove" and "The Little Minister," which really gave him a place in the cinema heavens. 1935 gave him three pictures: "Les Miserables," "Laddie" and "Break of Hearts." This year Mr. Beal has divided his time between the stage and screen. His most recent picture is "M'Liss" and he is scheduled for two more. They are "We Who Are About to Die" and "Mother Carey's Chickens." Weighing 150 pounds, he is 5 feet 10 inches tall and has brown hair and eyes. He is both an accomplished sketch artist and pianist. His wife is Helen Craig, who is most attractive, and they are very happily married. Mr. Beal's address is RKO-Radio Studios, 780 Gower St., Los Angeles, Calif.

SHIRLEY RICHARDS, Framingham, Mass.—Robert Kent was the lad who played Corporal Robert King in "The Country Beyond." He is slated to play in "King of the Royal Mounted" for 20th Century-Fox.

JOHN WAYNE: One of the more popular Western stars, Mr. Wayne was born in Winterset, Iowa, on May 26, 1907, the son of Clyde Leonard Morrisey and Mary Brown. His real name is Marion Michael Morrisey, which is probably why he changed it. Educated at the George Washington Grammar School of Keokuk, Iowa, and later at the Lancaster Grammar School in Lancaster, Calif., he then went to Glendale High School and from there to the University of Southern California. He was on the football team at that institution. During his junior year, John decided to leave and go into the motion picture business. His first job was that of prop boy and it was through this that he obtained his first crack at acting in "The Big Trail" in 1930. John is married to Josephine Saenz and they have two children. He has one brother, Emmet. Six feet 2 inches tall, he weighs 198 pounds, has dark brown hair and grey eyes. Quite naturally, he enjoys riding and watching football games, as well as playing bridge and poker. Under contract to Universal Studios, Universal City, Calif., his next picture will be "Coast Guard" with Nan Gray.

SIDNEY LERNER, Philadelphia, Pa.—There have been three versions of "The Witching Hour." In 1916 it was made by Frohman; in 1921 Paramount made the silent version of it; and in 1934 the same company released the talkie edition. Which one do you mean?

ALLAN JONES: Born in Scranton, Pa., on October 14, Allan inherited his Welsh father's fine tenor voice. Mr. Daniel H. Jones, a mine superintendent, saw to it that his son's vocal training was begun at the age of 4. At 8 he was singing in the church choir; at 10 he had resolved to pursue a musical career; at 11 he was a boy soprano; at 14 he was still with the choir, but singing alto. After that Allan developed into a tenor and to pay for his voice lessons ran errands, was a bank messenger, a laborer, coal truck driver and steam shovel engineer while attending high school in Scranton. He earned enough to enter the Syracuse University Music School, where, after a month of glee club singing, he won four scholarships. Came spring and Allan played a hunch. By staging a one-man concert in his home town he netted sufficient funds to take him to Paris to study. In the fall he returned, sang with the New York Philharmonic, then alternated between Paris and New York. He made a hit in opera, sang in musical stock in St. Louis, Boston and Chicago as well as on tour. Back in New York he was invited to make a screen test and signed to a contract. He has appeared in "Reckless," "A Night at the Opera," "Rose Marie" and "Show Boat," his latest. He's on tour at present, so there is no film scheduled for him. He is 6 feet tall, weighs 175 pounds and has dark brown hair and eyes. On July 26, 1936, Irene Hervey became Mrs. Allan Jones. Both have been married before. Irene has a daughter and Allan a son by the previous marriage. Write Mr. J. at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Washington Blvd., Culver City, Calif.

LORETTA YOUNG: She was born Gretchen Young in Salt Lake City, Utah, on January 6, 1913. Polly Ann Young and Sally Blane, her sisters, are also in the movies, though her brother Jack, now an attorney, was the first to take the step. There is also a younger sister, Georgiana, who is a likely candidate. Loretta is descended from American-English-French parents and was educated at Ramona Convent in Alhambra, Calif. Her screen career started when she was 4, as the baby in a Fanny Ward picture, but her real chance came when she answered a studio call for Polly, in the latter's absence, and was immediately awarded a role in Colleen Moore's "Naughty But Nice" in 1927. In 1929 she was a Wampas Baby Star, and now the name of Loretta Young ranks high in the cinema firmament. Outside of dramatic work she is interested in dancing and art, plays the piano and loves good music. Blue and white are her favorite colors, and salads and desserts her favorite foods. Loretta's hobby is shopping for pretty clothes, and she likes popular novels, attends the movies frequently and has a pet canary. She is fond of horseback riding, bicycling and ping pong, and likes to watch football games, horse races and polo. In 1929 Loretta married Grant Withers, but the marriage lasted only a year. Miss Young is 5 feet 3 inches tall, weighs 109 pounds and has light brown hair set off by huge blue-gray eyes. Her delicate coloring, plus her exquisite beauty, should be shown to good advantage in her latest picture, "Ramona," which is in technicolor. After that Loretta will be seen, along with Janet Gaynor and Constance Bennett, in "Ladies in Love." Under contract to 20th Century-Fox Studios, Box 900, Beverly Hills, Calif., you may write her there.

You'll find this chart simple to follow and a valuable guide in choosing film entertainment. Instead of giving you the individual ratings of Modern Screen and authoritative newspaper movie critics all over the country, we have struck an average of their ratings. You'll find this average under General Rating, beside each picture. 5★, extraordinary; 4★, very good; 3★, good; 2★, fair; 1★, poor. Asterisk denotes that Modern Screen ratings only are given on films not reviewed by newspapers as we go to press.

"I despise that powdery look in strong light"

ONE of the worst faults a powder can have is showing too much—an inquiry among 1,067 girls brings out!

Of 3 leading powders, Pond's got twice the votes of the next-liked powder, for "not giving that powdered look." Triple the votes of the third! The reason is in the colors of Pond's.

"Glare-proof" colors—Pond's colors catch only the softer rays of light—won't show up chalky in strongest glare. Special ingredients give Pond's its soft, clinging texture—keep it looking fresh for hours.

Low prices. Decorated screw-top jars, 35¢, 70¢. New big boxes, 10¢, 20¢.

Romances galore, lots of gay parties, and back-stage

Jeanette MacDonald's surprise birthday party was a huge success. Of course, Gene Raymond was there, and Nelson Eddy and Anita Louise came in for their share of cake and ice cream, too.

Sharing one box at the Actors' Fund Benefit, if you'll look closely you'll see: first row, Cary Grant, Glenda Farrell and Randy Scott; second row, Mr. and Mrs. Stu Erwin and Mary Brian, Cary's best girl.

Joan Blondell and Dick Powell will probably have the judge pronounce them man and wife shortly after the state of California tells Joan she's a single gal again. And if you don't believe it's love you should see Joan walking around the Bel Air golf course with Dick these mornings—just to keep him company while he plays. It's amusing to note that despite their real-life courtship their studio doesn't consider them the proper romantic types for each other. Remember in "Colleen" Dick walked off with Ruby Keeler and Joan drew Jack Oakie? And now in "Stage Struck" they go their separate ways once more.

Shirley Temple is two up on most movie stars. She's fallen for three young men at once. The lucky trio is the Weidler boys, and they admit to being seven, nine and ten. They're Virginia's brothers and they're appearing in a singing number in Shirley's new picture, "The Bowery Princess." Any engagement rumors are unfounded, however, for the blonde siren has decided to complete her education before considering marriage.

Arline Judge and Wesley Ruggles are enjoying a typical Hollywood separation. They still live in the same home, each in a different wing. At the moment Ruggles is directing his estranged bride in "Valiant Is the Word for Carrie." And last month they tossed an elegant party for a few hundred of their most intimate friends. Arline greeted the guests in a bathing suit and later, as the cool of the evening approached, changed into a frock. Perhaps the best remark of the afternoon was George Jessel's. When he arrived, he glanced about at the numerous guests disporting themselves at tables and at the bar and cracked: "I don't think this place will catch on."

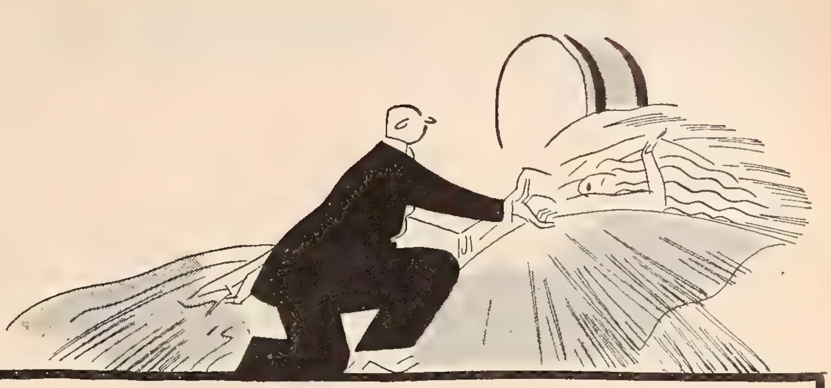
And what popular singing star recently loaned his gal friend a thousand dollars and kept the young lady's jewels as security? The jools were returned when the gal paid back the thousand, plus interest.

NEWS!



chatter are still the stars' favorite pastimes this fall

Reading from left clock-wise, we have Norma Shearer, her hubby, Irving Thalberg, Doug Fairbanks, Sr., Gilbert Roland, Constance Bennett and Mrs. Doug (Lady Ashley) at the Actors' Fund Benefit.

Scotty snapped this popular foursome at one of their recent Trocadero splurges. Robert Taylor and his best girl, Barbara Stanwyck, Joan Crawford and hubby, Franchot Tone.

Mu. [illegible] accompanied by at le[illegible] three males, has gone back to the single standard. The lucky man in this case happens to be her husband, Captain Philip Astley, who recently journeyed to Hollywood from London to take Madeleine back to Europe for a vacation. "I didn't doubt that Madeleine was coming home," said the handsome Captain, "but I thought it was worth making sure."

Fred Astaire has a phobia against visitors on the set during rehearsals. For the final take it's okay, which reverses the way most of the stars feel about it. So a femme writer, interviewing Fred, decided to get at the bottom of this. "It seems silly to me, Astaire, your being so exclusive regarding arsals," she said. "Would it seem silly to " inquired Fred, "if I should want to see ir first draft on this story?" The jury is l out, but they'll probably be unanimous for uittal.

Anyone wanting to see the "Who's Who" at M-G-M these days simply drops in on the "Born to Dance" set. The Gables, the Harlows, the Crawfords, the Montgomerys and so on stand around in awed silence watching Eleanor Powell go through her routines. The gal is amazing, for her energy mounts as the day goes on, and by five o'clock when the rest of the cast has wilted, her dancing's at a peak. To top it all off she spends a couple of evenings a week with Jimmy Stewart at the Trocadero—dancing.

Instead of her planned trip to Honolulu, Kay Francis spent a couple of weeks recently in the Hollywood Hospital. According to medical reports her confinement was due to a pair of impacted wisdom teeth, but according to Kay it was due to costume changes for "Mistress of Fashion," her next picture. "Thirty-six changes," said Kay. "I envy the girls who complain because they have nothing to wear."

When Marlene Dietrich completed "The Garden of Allah" she wrapped up her accent and left immediately for Europe. Her reservations on the Normandie, for herself, daughter Maria, nurse and hairdresser called for two suites, including her own dining-room and a private sun deck, complete with

(Below, right) Do you recognize these handsome Floradora Girls? Well, reading from left to right, they are: Toby Wing, Betty Furness, Olivia de Havilland and Patricia Ellis. (Left) Frances Dee and Joel McCrea make one of their rare public appearances at a social to-do—Katharine Cornell's West Coast opening in "St. Joan."

swimming pool. We can remember 'way back when it who wanted to be alone.

Watched Lew Ayres on the "Murder with Pictures he seemed to be carrying on without a trace of heartbreak. The fact that he was making love to Gail Patrick at the moment might have had something to do with it, of course. Gail was beautiful in a sireny black satin gown, long earrings—and felt bedroom slippers. It's a Hollywood trick for making tall gals see eye to eye with their heroes.

Talked to Isabel Jewell in the Brown Derby, and met her fiance, Owen Crump, a Hollywood radio producer. "I'm signing a life-term contract in October," said Isabel. "And," added Mr. C., "with no options." An ironic touch, if you will, was that Isabel was seated directly beneath a caricature of Lee Tracy. He was her steady beau for a long, long time—and not so terribly long ago, either.

ran out and he dressed the little lady down in good round American phrases, the kind more prevalent in Brooklyn than in Paris. And —surprise!—she knew exactly what he meant, and tried out a couple of her own in return. Result: a spanking for the mademoiselle and a promise to be good.

"Ah, Romeo, Romeo, wherefore art thou, Romeo?" This classic line from "Romeo and Juliet" could well have been asked by any visitor to the set during the picture's production. For Romeo, between scenes, was equipped with horn-rimmed glasses and a pipe, hardly fitting accessories for the fanciest lover in old Verona, but constant companions for Leslie Howard. But it makes one wonder if fair Juliet would have rushed to the balcony for a guy in horn-rimmed glasses.

good news

(Left) Scotty snapped some more staunch troupers for the Actors' Benefit. Here's a pair we defy you to identify without our help. Give up? It's Paula Stone and her famous dad, Fred Stone, as the Scarecrow and the Tin Woodman.

The big battle at the moment is the one being caused by the invasion of radio into Hollywood. With a number of the big air shows selling their tooth paste and so forth from these parts, the demand for picture names has become, to coin a word, terrific. For instance, for his appearance in a 20-minute radio version of "Men in White" Clark Gable received $5,000. And what miffed the boys on the check-writing end was the fact that Mr. G. grabbed his pittance and walked out without allowing the program's sponsors to photograph him. Seems there was a clause in the Gable contract which stated he was not to be touched after the check changed hands.

Before leaving on a stage tour to try out gags for their forthcoming picture, "A Day at the Races," the Marx Brothers rented a Hollywood theatre for a rehearsal. The theatre manager neglected to mention that he had rented the place for two hours at noon for a political rally, and the boys were taken somewhat by surprise when the theatre filled up and the speeches began. But Harpo rose to the occasion and, unrecognized, got off a stirring speech extolling the virtues of the candidate, whom he had never seen before. Later, when the hat was passed Harpo stuffed it with bills. "It was for the good of the party," said Harpo. "And besides, it was stage money."

Beauty Hints Dept.: They spent twelve hours trying to give Ginger Rogers a shampoo in "Swing Time." Soap, it seems, won't stay frothy long enough to photograph. Beaten eggs were poured on the Rogers' tresses, but they collapsed under the Kliegs. So they heaped whipped cream on her, but it was no go. "As for me," moaned Ginger, "I'll take vanilla." "That's it!" yelled the director. And that's what you'll see Ginger being shampooed with—vanilla ice cream.

Jean Arthur's press agents would have you believe that the head of her studio recently received a request for an autographed photo of Miss A. from a 9-year-old fan. "I understand she's married," said the youthful admirer, "so don't tell her husband. I don't want to cause any trouble."

THERE'S glorious fragrance—the perfume of youth—in April Showers Talc. There's luxury supreme in its soothing, smoothing touch. Yet the cost is low for quality so high.

Exquisite... but not Expensive

At Vic McLaglen's tennis party: Herb Mundin, Wendy Barrie, ye host, and Binnie Barnes.

Wonder how Claudette Colbert and Norman Foster felt when they did a broadcast of "The Barker." They were once married—remember?

Ned Sparks was struggling with a violin when we watched him on the set the other day. He was scheduled to play it in a scene, but the thing baffled him. "Here," said the director, "let me show you. I took lessons for ten years. From Sparks' dead pan came: "Do you want to wait that long for this scene?"

Note on the Classics: A certain Hollywood gent, when asked if he liked "Romeo and Juliet," shook his head. "I can't stand any of Shakespeare's stuff," replied the scholarly critic. "I didn't like 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' and I didn't like 'A Tale of Two Cities'." He probably won't even like "Anthony Adverse," by W. Somerset Dickens.

Jean Muir and the Warner Brothers have called off their feud and Miss M. is once more a fair-haired gal on the lot. Jean's a young lady of decided opinions, but her studio contended they didn't hire her for that particular talent. A few opinions about acting were permissible, provided it was the Muir acting. So now Jean's keeping her views on directing and producing to herself and the dove of peace once more flies over the Warner studio with—according to observers—a long-term contract in its beak.

Sound men and director Richard Boleslawski became pretty frantic one day on the "Garden of Allah" set. Marlene Dietrich was doing a scene, and doing it well, but each time they played it back there was a grating noise on the sound track. They scoured the place and couldn't discover a thing that might be causing it, until someone cast a suspicious eye toward the camels on the set. The camels, it was discovered, had a nasty habit of gnashing their teeth. They were immediately given to understand that on a Dietrich picture teeth-gnashing is done only by La Dietrich herself, and occasionally her director.

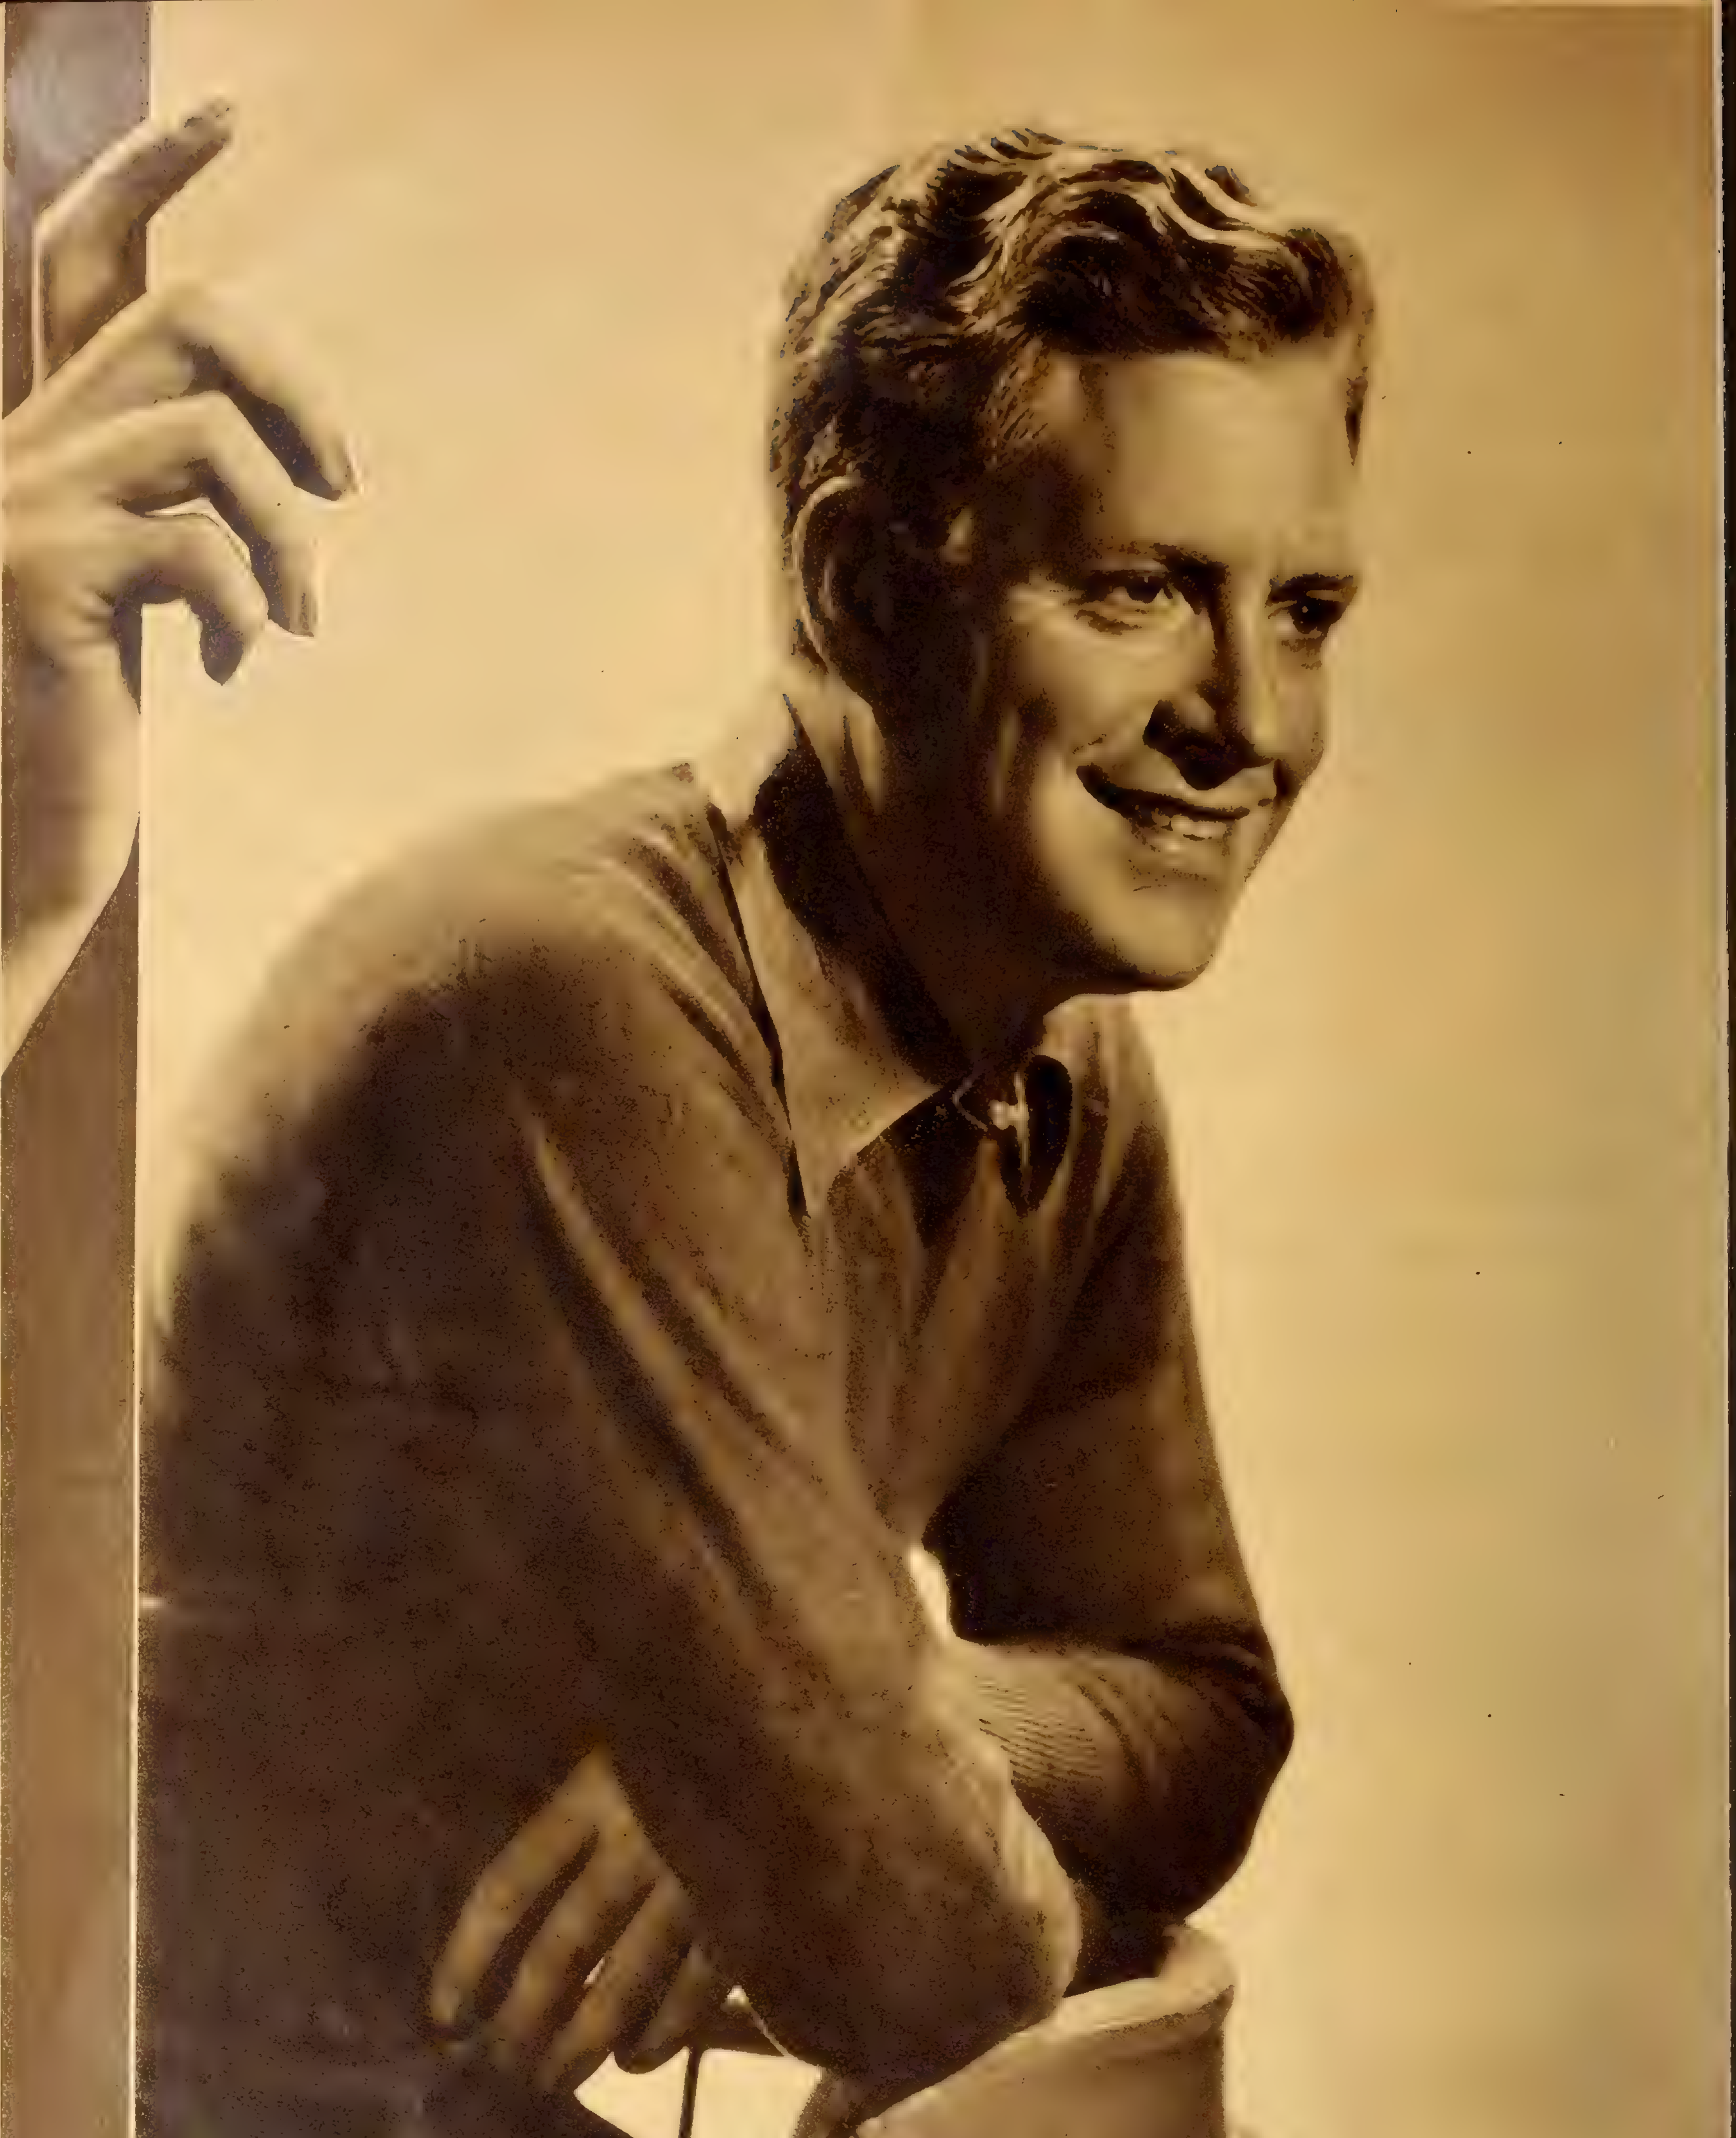
STAR-GREAT! EMOTION-MIGHTY! THE STRANGEST DRAMA EVER LIVED!

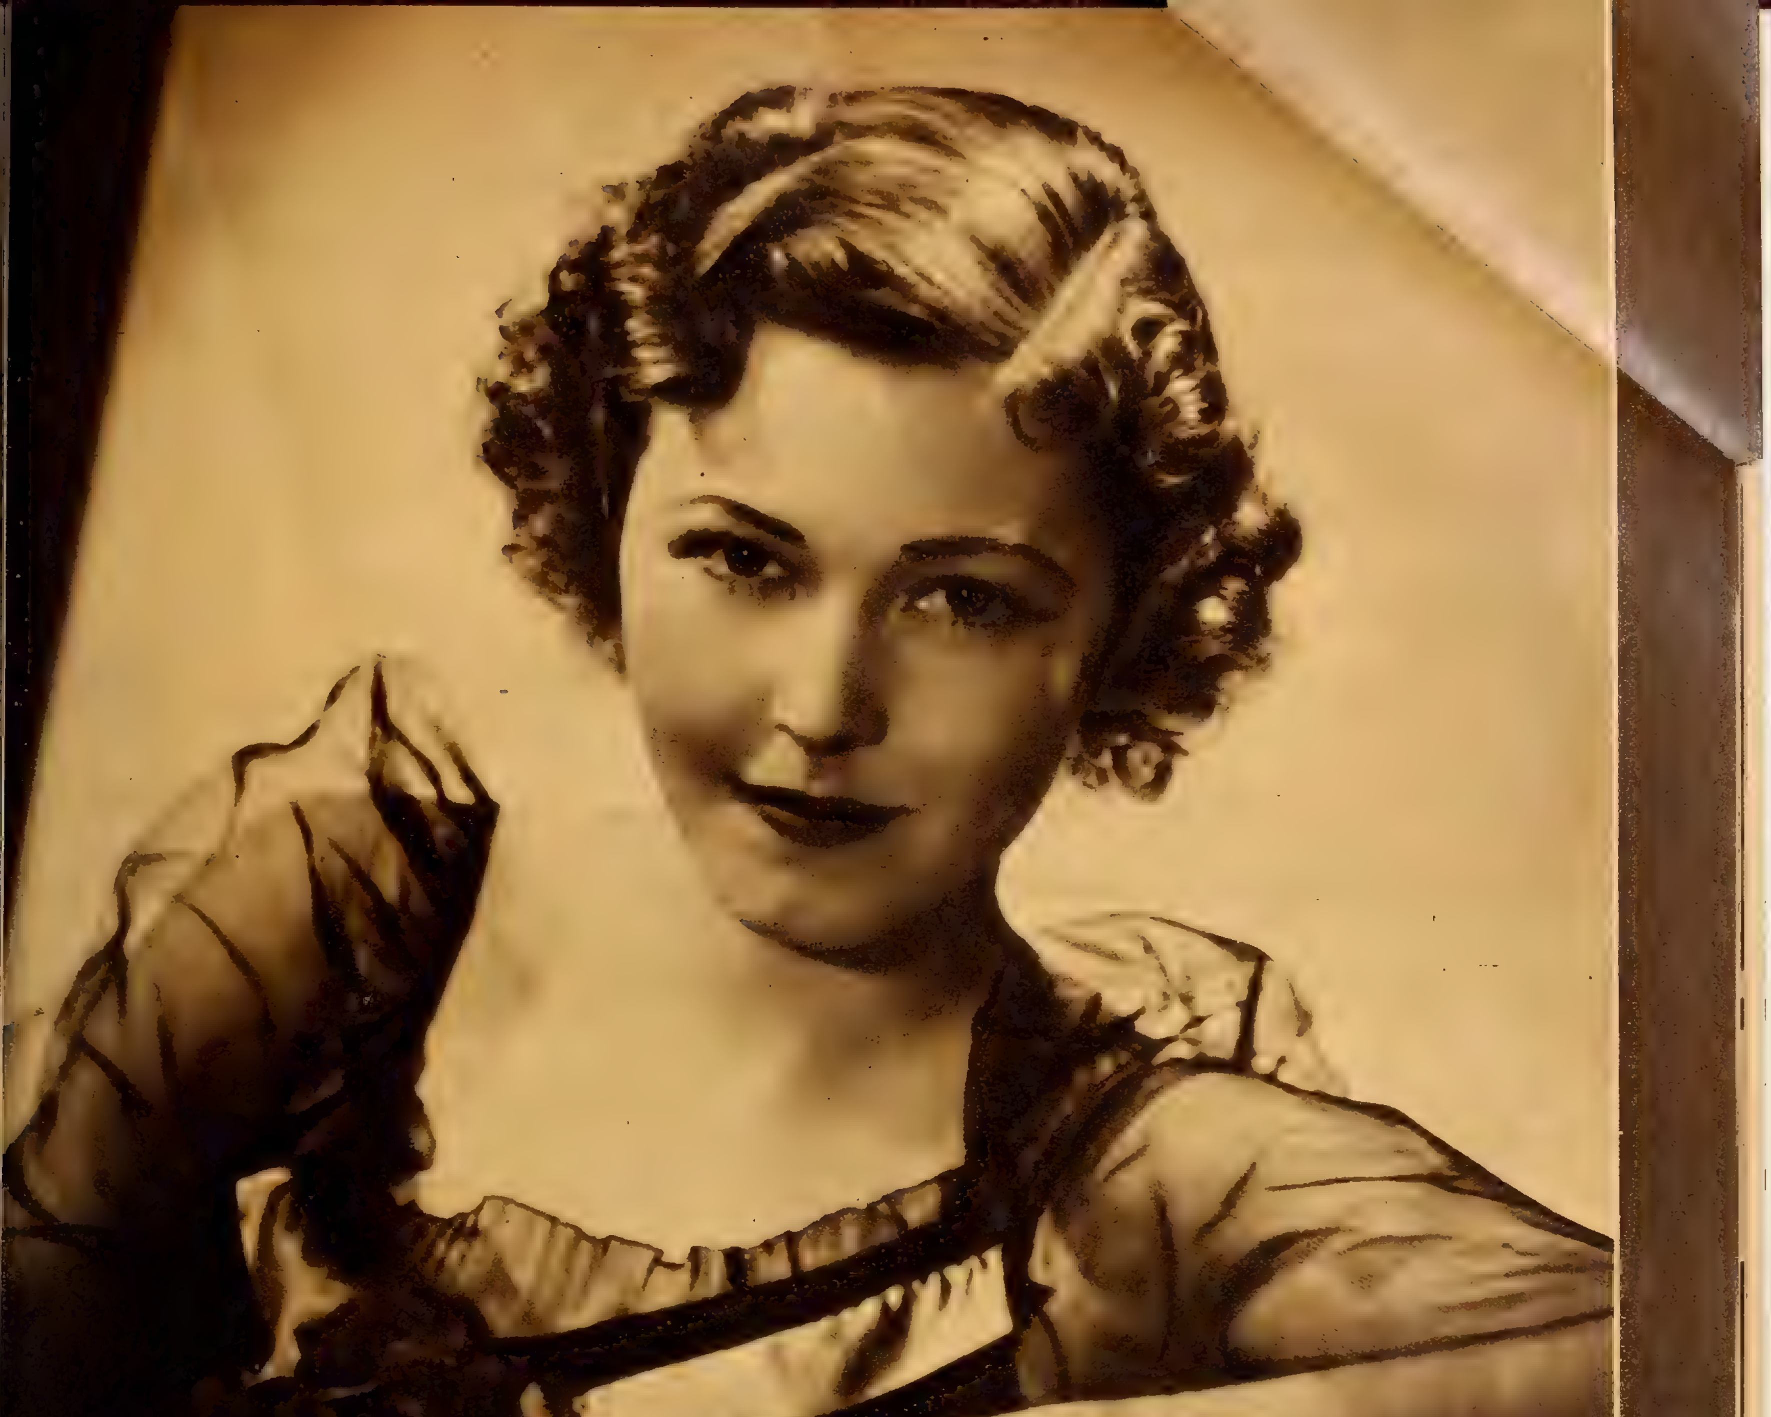
ELEANOR POWELL

"Born to Dance." What could be a more apt title for a picture starring the light-footed and rhythmic Eleanor? Recovered completely from the breakdown that took her out of a stage show, she makes a screen return in step with Buddy Ebsen.



NELSON EDDY

It seems as if we can't print enough pictures of Nelson Eddy to suit you, so here's a slick new informal shot of the popular fellow. As you may know, he will be seen and heard next in "Maytime" with Jeanette MacDonald.



JOSEPHINE HUTCHINSON

Josephine is one recruit from the eastern stage who has fallen for California and the screen. She's been taking a vacation since making "I Married a Doctor" and after a brief stage appearance, she returns to make a new picture.

ROBERT TAYLOR

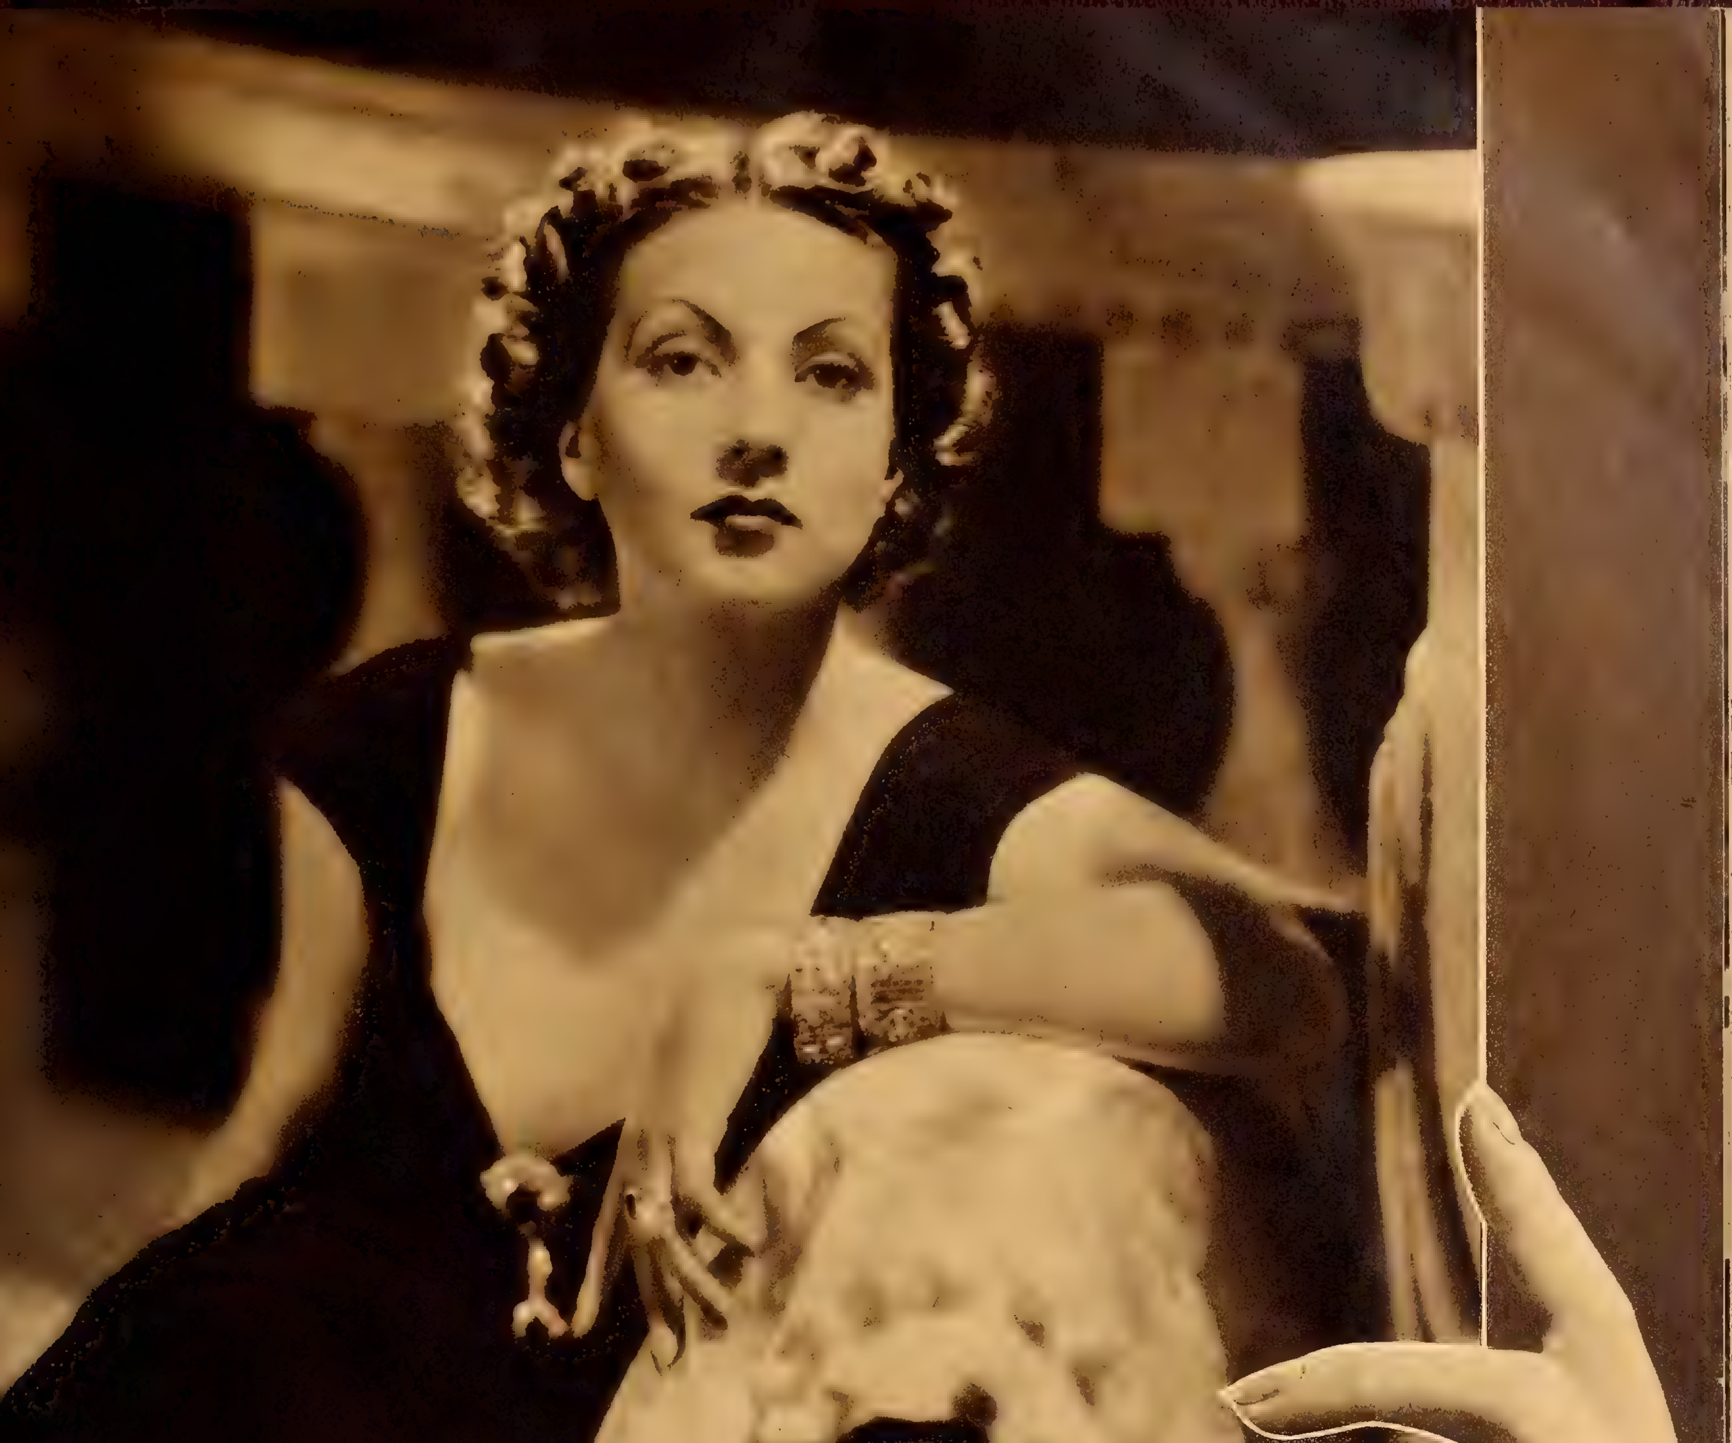
If Mr. T. ever doubted his popularity, his first trip to New York convinced him almost too forcibly. The poor gent was mobbed! He still dates La Stanwyck and is Armand to Garbo's "Camille."

GLENDA FARRELL

Glenda must have felt funny off her home lot to make "High Tension" with Brian Donlevy, for she's not a player who hops from studio to studio. Back at Warners now, she's in "Gold Diggers of 1937."

RANDOLPH SCOTT

Randy gets along in his quiet Southern way. And no one so far has been able to lure him from his pleasant bachelor state. He has just shed the buckskin trappings he wore in "The Last of the Mohicans."



ANN SOTHERN

She's as versatile in her looks as she is in her acting. Isn't this the perfect pose of the sophisticate? Yet actually, Ann's one of Hollywood's sweller scouts—no hokum nor fuss. "Walking on Air" is her newest picture.

Katie swore that she'd be different—and there's no doubt that she is!

BY HARRY LANG

KATIE WANTS to be herself. She wants to do as she jolly well pleases, and most of the time she does. If, in so doing, she steps on somebody's corns, well, that's their lookout. And if anybody doesn't like what she does, they can go jump in a lake as far as Katie is concerned.

Fear? Say, Katie Hepburn has no more fear in her than you'll find in a plastered sailor. She's not afraid of strangers or friends, directors or studio bosses, kings or people who write movie columns.

There was the day, for instance, she came to the set boiling because of a crack taken at her in the morning paper by a famous film writer. Other movie people—stars and directors, even—quail before the power of that writer's word. Any other star, bawled out in the column as was Katie, would have cringed. Katie merely stood in the middle of the stage, that day, yelled across to one of the studio publicity men:

"Hey, you!! Where's that so-and-so who wrote that about me in the morning paper?"

Trembling, the press-agent averred he hadn't any idea where the writer was.

"Well, I just dare you to bring her on this set!" shouted Katie.

THE PRESS-AGENT sneaked out and reported to his boss what had happened. Great precautions were taken to keep the all-powerful columnist away from Katie from then on. What Katie would have said, had they met, would probably have had the columnist's wrath on the collective head of RKO studios for the rest of seven lifetimes. And it's a press-agent's job to prevent things like that.

But Katie doesn't give two toots in a tornado about a press-agent's job, or anybody else's besides her own. As a matter of fact, she'd just as soon demand a press-agent's dismissal, as not. Like the day she stood on the street and threw rocks at the second-story windows of the studio publicity departments. Her "unit-man," the chap who writes the blurbs about her, stuck out his head, dodged a stone, and asked her what she wanted.

"Throw me down the book of stills," she yelled. "I wanna see 'em."

"I can't throw 'em down. They'd get mussed up," he protested. "I'll bring them, if you'll wait, or you can come up an' get 'em."

Katie hit the ceiling. She'd be triple-distilled et cetera, if she'd wait. "Throw 'em down, or I'll break up this whole building," she screamed. In the racket, the publicity chief appeared. He didn't stick out his head. He tiptoed down a back way, got a studio boss, and carried the stills out to Katie, still thundering in the street. After demanding that the boss forthwith fire the press-agent, Katie sat on the curb, while he and the studio big-shot waited, calmly selecting the stills she wanted.

(P. S.—The press-agent was not fired.)

Of course, it is difficult to reconcile Katie's protestations of contempt for press-agents and her assertions that she doesn't care what's written or printed about her, with her own reactions. Katie somehow manages to see just about every article about her that gets into print. The press-agents who work with her believe, implicitly, that she subscribes secretly to a clipping bureau. "Maybe she doesn't," they admit, "but how can she see so many pieces about herself if she doesn't?"

Hepburn, hollywood's show-off!

What prompts this unpredictable redhead's goofy goings-on? Is she sincere or just an exhibitionist?

ANYWAY, it's axiomatic that no matter what is printed about her, Katie raises the nether regions about it. She's known as the most un-pleaseable person in movies, when it comes to publicity. And if you don't think that's tough on the boys and girls who try to earn their forty or fifty a week by writing about Katie without getting fired, then you ought to see the air of apprehension that pervades the studio's press department when someone wants to do a story on La Hepburn!

But enough of Katie and press-agents. Let's giggle at some of the other things she does, now. And let's give her, too, the whole-hearted admiration she rates for some of the hearty, fine, regular-guy things she does. In all Hollywood, you'll find no star as cordially hated as Hepburn, and at the same time, as cordially worshipped. There are those who have reason for both.

Among her staunchest admirers is old Mary Gordon, one-time stage actress, not long ago reduced to extra work, to live. During one of Hepburn's pictures, she was hired just because her Scotch accent was good, and they needed some real Scotch burrs in the back-stage chatter. For the same picture, they were making tests of character actresses for a small role in the picture. One "name-actress" after another tried out and couldn't fit the role. Mary Gordon asked for a chance. They laughed at her. "We need somebody who's known," they told her.

Mary plucked together her nerve and went to Hepburn herself and told her story.

"Sure you'll take the test," Hepburn exploded. And Hepburn forthwith exercised her autocratic power on the set—and believe me, it is power! Before another day was past, old Mary Gordon took the test. And what's more, she clicked, and got the role. And more, from that role on, Mary's star has risen in Hollywood—and she's out of the extra ranks and in the wanted-player stratum. Hepburn doesn't sit back and gloat over how good she was to Mary, though. Now that Mary's got her job, let her look out for herself—particularly when Katie's around with that devilish "candid camera" of hers. One of Katie's prize shots is a posterior view of Mary Gordon, tying her shoelace. It's as undignified a position as any nice old lady would want to be photographed in. But Katie took it.

Katie and that camera are dynamite. She delights in getting the most outrageously unposed sneak-shots of her friends and enemies and co-workers. Her collection of amazing pictures is large.

Yet—Katie won't stand being candid-camera-ed! She can dish it out, but she can't take it. She knows that off-stage she looks like a gargoyle on vacation. Without any make-up, with her hair flying as though it had never known a comb, with the outlandishly unladylike clothes she affects, and with her penchant (Continued on page 83)

Victor McLaglen is one of those great men whose deeds

THE REAL Victor McLaglen is a man of whose existence you have never had the faintest suspicion. I know, at least, that I never had the most remote conception of what he was all about until I talked with him for three hours a short time ago.

I'd talked to him, briefly, once before. I'd seen most of his pictures. I'd heard him say, "Sez you" to Eddie Lowe's "Sez me." And I'd taken him at the "sez-you" valuation. Heroic, but hard.

I'd seen him in "The Informer" and that should have forewarned me. For only a man with great pity in his heart, with his senses strung to humanity's suffering, could have given us so superbly, so convincingly the poor, stupefied, inarticulate Informer. But all I saw was the superb performance. All I felt was impatience with Hollywood for having allowed so splendid an actor to go so long without the proper material.

To be completely, if tactlessly, honest I didn't think I'd like him. I didn't think we'd have anything in common. He was the kind of man, I thought, who cared about nothing save horses and war and taking his luck as he found it.

How wrong I was!

I thought I knew quite a lot about Victor McLaglen. I knew that he was an Englishman (naturalized American citizen now, which is not generally known) and that his father was an Anglican bishop. I knew that there were eight stalwart McLaglen brothers and one sister and that he had been everywhere in the world—an adventurer, a soldier of many fortunes.

And I'd heard how, when there seemed to be no new worlds left for him to conquer, no new wars to fight, he had drifted back to London feeling, he said, "like a spectator in an empty theatre after the curtain has gone down." It was then that he had been intrigued by the novel adventure of motion pictures and had played his first part in, aptly, "The Call of the Road."

He married an English girl, daughter of an army officer, whom he had met at a wedding. He has been sixteen years on the screen and that, with the just awarding of the Academy prize, those sixteen years finally were crowned with what should, so obviously, have been their face value all along.

THESE THINGS I knew and you may know them, too. But of the man who has emerged from the shell of so much hard living, with such vast reservoirs of tenderness for his fellow men, and such love of home and profound, abiding love of his children—of this man I had no idea at all.

For the man I didn't know existed is a lover and a connoisseur of roses. I didn't know about his cherished rose-gardens at home or that he tends the flowers as wisely, as expertly, as faithfully as a Burbank might have done. He didn't tell me, but a close friend of his did, that even on wild rainy nights, no matter how late he may come home, he goes out into the garden to see how his roses fare.

I had no idea how sensitive is the man who dwells inside that seemingly hard-weathered exterior—but after I had talked with him a friend told me what seemed to be the essence of Victor McLaglen, the last word. One day, some time ago, his young son proudly brought home a rather hideous terra cotta statuette of a famous radio star. The famous star had given it to the boy and he treasured it, even as he admired the star. He placed it, conspicuously, atop the victrola cabinet in the very beautiful McLaglen living-room. Someone objected, "The idea! A thing like that in here!" But Victor, quietly, intervened on his son's behalf. And the statuette remained there. For Victor understood, you see, that the crude little object was precious to his son. And far better to have a crude and jarring note in a room than to hurt the shining pride and pleasure of a child.

And that, my friends, is Victor McLaglen.

I KNEW, actually, very little about Victor's "Sports Center" here in Hollywood. It hasn't been publicized. And what I know I gleaned from Victor's studio associates, not from Victor. I learned that he started the enterprise some six months ago for the purpose of presenting soccer to Southern California. And for this he built a stadium which seats ten (Continued on page 76)

Are you influenced by screen you'll be amazed to read what

His role in "Magnificent Obsession" made a different person of Robert Taylor. It took him weeks and weeks to return to normal living and thinking.

Ginger Rogers, as the temperamental, tempestuous movie star of the comedy, "In Person," continued to act the role at home with amusing results.

BY KATHARINE HARTLEY

HAVE YOU ever come away from a picture, so affected by its mood that it took hours, maybe days, for you to snap out of it? Have you ever come away from a picture, so affected by its leading character that you found yourself walking and talking and thinking and acting just like him? Of course, you have! Dozens of times!

Psychologists call it "personality transference." But don't let that alarm you—it happens in the best of families. It happens to the young girl who sees "Anna Karenina," and then goes around acting tragic and martyred in the best Garbo manner for a month afterward. It happens to Jim, when Ronald Colman, in "A Tale of Two Cities," inspires him to grow cynical about life and heroic about love—till that wears off a few days later. It happens to Dad. Dignified, after seeing Lewis Stone in a typical Lewis Stone role. Giddy, after Frank Morgan. It happens to Mother, too, and even to Aunt Ella. If Aunt Ella saw "David Copperfield," three to one she was bossing you all over the place, just like Edna May Oliver—until, in self-defense, you took her to see sweet May Robson! Not one of us is immune!

But here's the point. If you and I, and Jim and Dad, and all of us other mere observers are so easily influenced by screen portrayals, think what must happen to the stars who actually do the portraying! How much more susceptible they must be! After all, we watch a character for only an hour and three quarters, and it touches us. But the star has been acting that part—creating it, living it, being it—for a couple of weeks, at least!

An experience Bob Taylor had shows just how deeply a role can get under a fellow's skin!

Some time ago Bob left his home lot to go to Universal to play opposite Irene Dunne in "The Magnificent Obsession." He was gone fourteen weeks. When he returned, all his friends said, "What have you done to yourself? You've changed. You look older."

In telling me about it Bob said, "I not only looked older, but I felt older. I was older. The part of Bobby Merrick did that to me. In the beginning he was young,

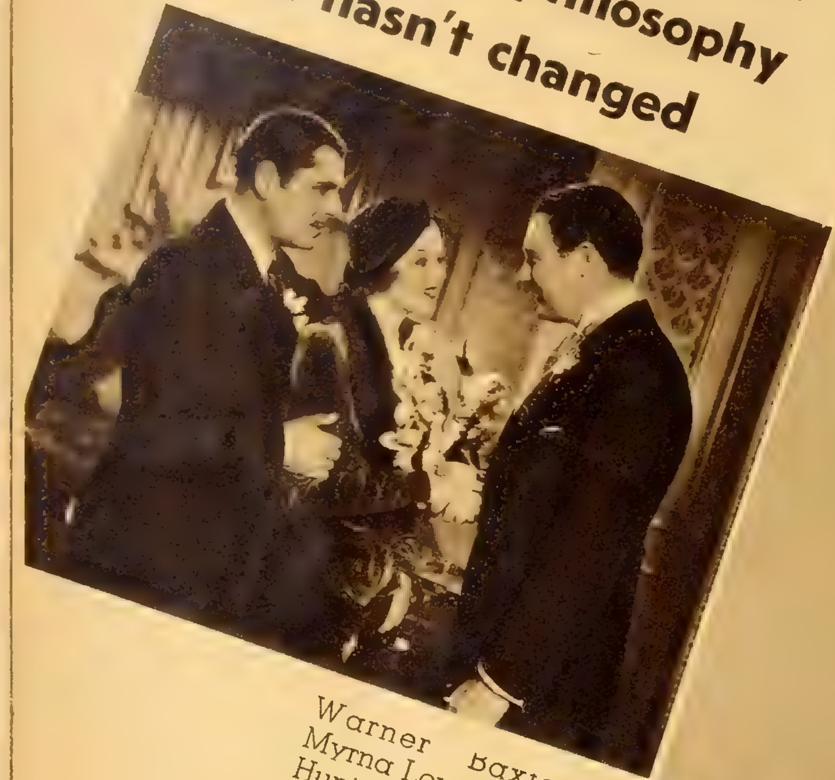
Warner Baxter has known lean times and days of plenty, but his philosophy of life hasn't changed



Warner Baxter, Myrna Loy and Ian Hunter in a scene from "To Mary—With Love."

BY REGINALD TAVINER

YOU CAN'T eat your cake and have it, too? Well, maybe not, but Warner Baxter does. That is, he does now.

Time was, and not so very long ago, either, when Warner had to content himself with the crumbs that fell from Hollywood's table. Now he cuts himself any slice he wants. It took both sides of the picture to bring about his present philosophy of life.

"What life means to me?" he repeated, thoughtfully. "That's taking in a lot of territory, isn't it? I think life is very much like a merry-go-round. You don't know which horse you have to ride."

He knew which horse he wanted to bet on, though, even if it did take the nag quite a while to win.

Hollywood is very fond of talking about the "breaks." You get 'em or you don't. Anybody in Hollywood will tell you how a jack-rabbit jumping through a windshield landed like Lady Luck plumb in Warner's lap; how that freak of fate got him his "break" in "In Old Arizona," and how he's been sitting on top of the world ever since.

It's all true, too. Nobody will admit it quicker than Warner himself. But like so many Hollywood truths it's only a half-truth. Hollywood won't bother to dwell upon the stamina it takes to stick around waiting for the rabbit, never knowing whether one is going to jump or not.

That's why Warner Baxter, the star, is far more humble in spirit than he ever was while he was knocking around the various lots in the old silent days looking for a job. The fat years have taught him more than the lean ones ever could. That's why he doesn't comprehend his own popularity, doesn't really believe the size of his own pay-check or the overflowing stacks of his own fan mail. "I always had the feeling that it would come," he said, "and that inner conviction was what enabled me to carry on when times were tough, of course. Now that it has come, I'm still wondering what it's all about."

And, now that he's got it, he's wondering just what it was he wanted.

I want to be slatternly nd seductive. I want to make love and be torrid. I want be mysterious and glamorous and unpredictable and ightly mad.

"Perhaps the word 'dishonest' is something of a mis-omer. I know that the dictionary definition reads some-ing like this: Dishonest; lacking in honesty; fraudulent; ntrustworthy; false. The 'false' part is the only part pplicable to what I mean. I don't mean, of course, that want to be dishonest about paying my bills, doing my b to the best of my ability, meeting my obligations. But wish that I could be, as it were, false to myself. I wish at I could create an illusion. I wish that I could be mething, or someone, I am not.

"Every great artist of the stage and screen has been nsational in one way or another. Bernhardt was notori-us for her temperament. Valentino, Barbara La Marr, hn Gilbert, Garbo, Dietrich—all of them have worn ystery like a garment, headlines like a crown.

"It doesn't pay to be regular. It's detrimental to be ice. People don't go to the theatre or to pictures to see their next-door neighbors go through their paces. They want some strangeling to make them aware of the many mysteries of man and woman."

Rosalind, in brown slacks and leaf-green sweater, poured tea as we sat on the chintz divan in the living-room of her white brick house in Beverly Hills.

SHE CONTINUED to kick over the traces. She was saying, cinnamon-toastishly, "I'm getting along all right as I am. My salary has been increased. But I think I'd make a shorter cut to the enviable heights if I were not as I am. If I could scream and have hysterics when producers do not cast me as I would like to be cast. If I could be temperamental and walk out when things are not to my liking. If I could stage emotional scenes, tear my hair and gnash my teeth to get my way.

"Even in little things—take this interview, for instance. I should be receiving you as Theda Bara once received the Press—swirled in clouds of incense, swathed in furs in midsummer, the room Oriental and dimly lit, the effect—tremendous. Soft-footed attendants should appear from nowhere with frail glasses and amber liqueurs. But what do I do? I did plan to be wearing a silken something when you arrived. the small towner

John Boles is one of the few stars eager to admit he was born in "the sticks." On completing "Craig's Wife," he will do "Cuban Cavalier."

BY JAMES REID

John Boles tells, for the first time, why he is glad

I'M GLAD that I come from a small town," John Boles told me. "I'm glad that I married a girl from a small town. If I hadn't I don't think I'd be where I am today. And I'm positive that I wouldn't be as happy as I am."

I jotted down those words in my memory. Here was a surprising statement from a movie star. Plenty of stars have been born in small towns, but most of them like to forget it. If they do admit that they were born in "the sticks," they hasten to add that they left early.

Clark Gable, for example, was born in Cadiz, Ohio, which won't be a city for one thousand years. You never heard anyone crediting Cadiz with Clark's rise to fame and fortune. In his teens, the restless Mr. Gable felt the lure of larger towns, packed his bag and pulled away. Grace Moore has said that if she hadn't felt confined by the smallness of Jellico, Tennessee, and if she hadn't left it, she never would have become a singer or lived a rich, full life. There are a score of other famous examples.

Yet, John Boles was giving me, in all seriousness, just the opposite kind of story—John Boles, the handsome sophisticate; the smooth-mannered, well-tailored man-of-the-world; the poised actor, the gifted singer. He was trying to tell me that a small town in Texas, named Greenville, was largely responsible for his being what he is, and where he is, today. And I didn't laugh.

John Boles may be an actor—but he confines his acting to studio sound stages. He may know theatrical "lines"—but only the microphones hear them. He is probably the least publicity-conscious person in the movies. He can't be bothered, planning poses when it's so much easier, just being himself. That isn't the standard way of becoming A Personality Off-Screen, but it is John Boles' way. It is also half the explanation of his screen naturalness. It all traces back to Greenville, Texas.

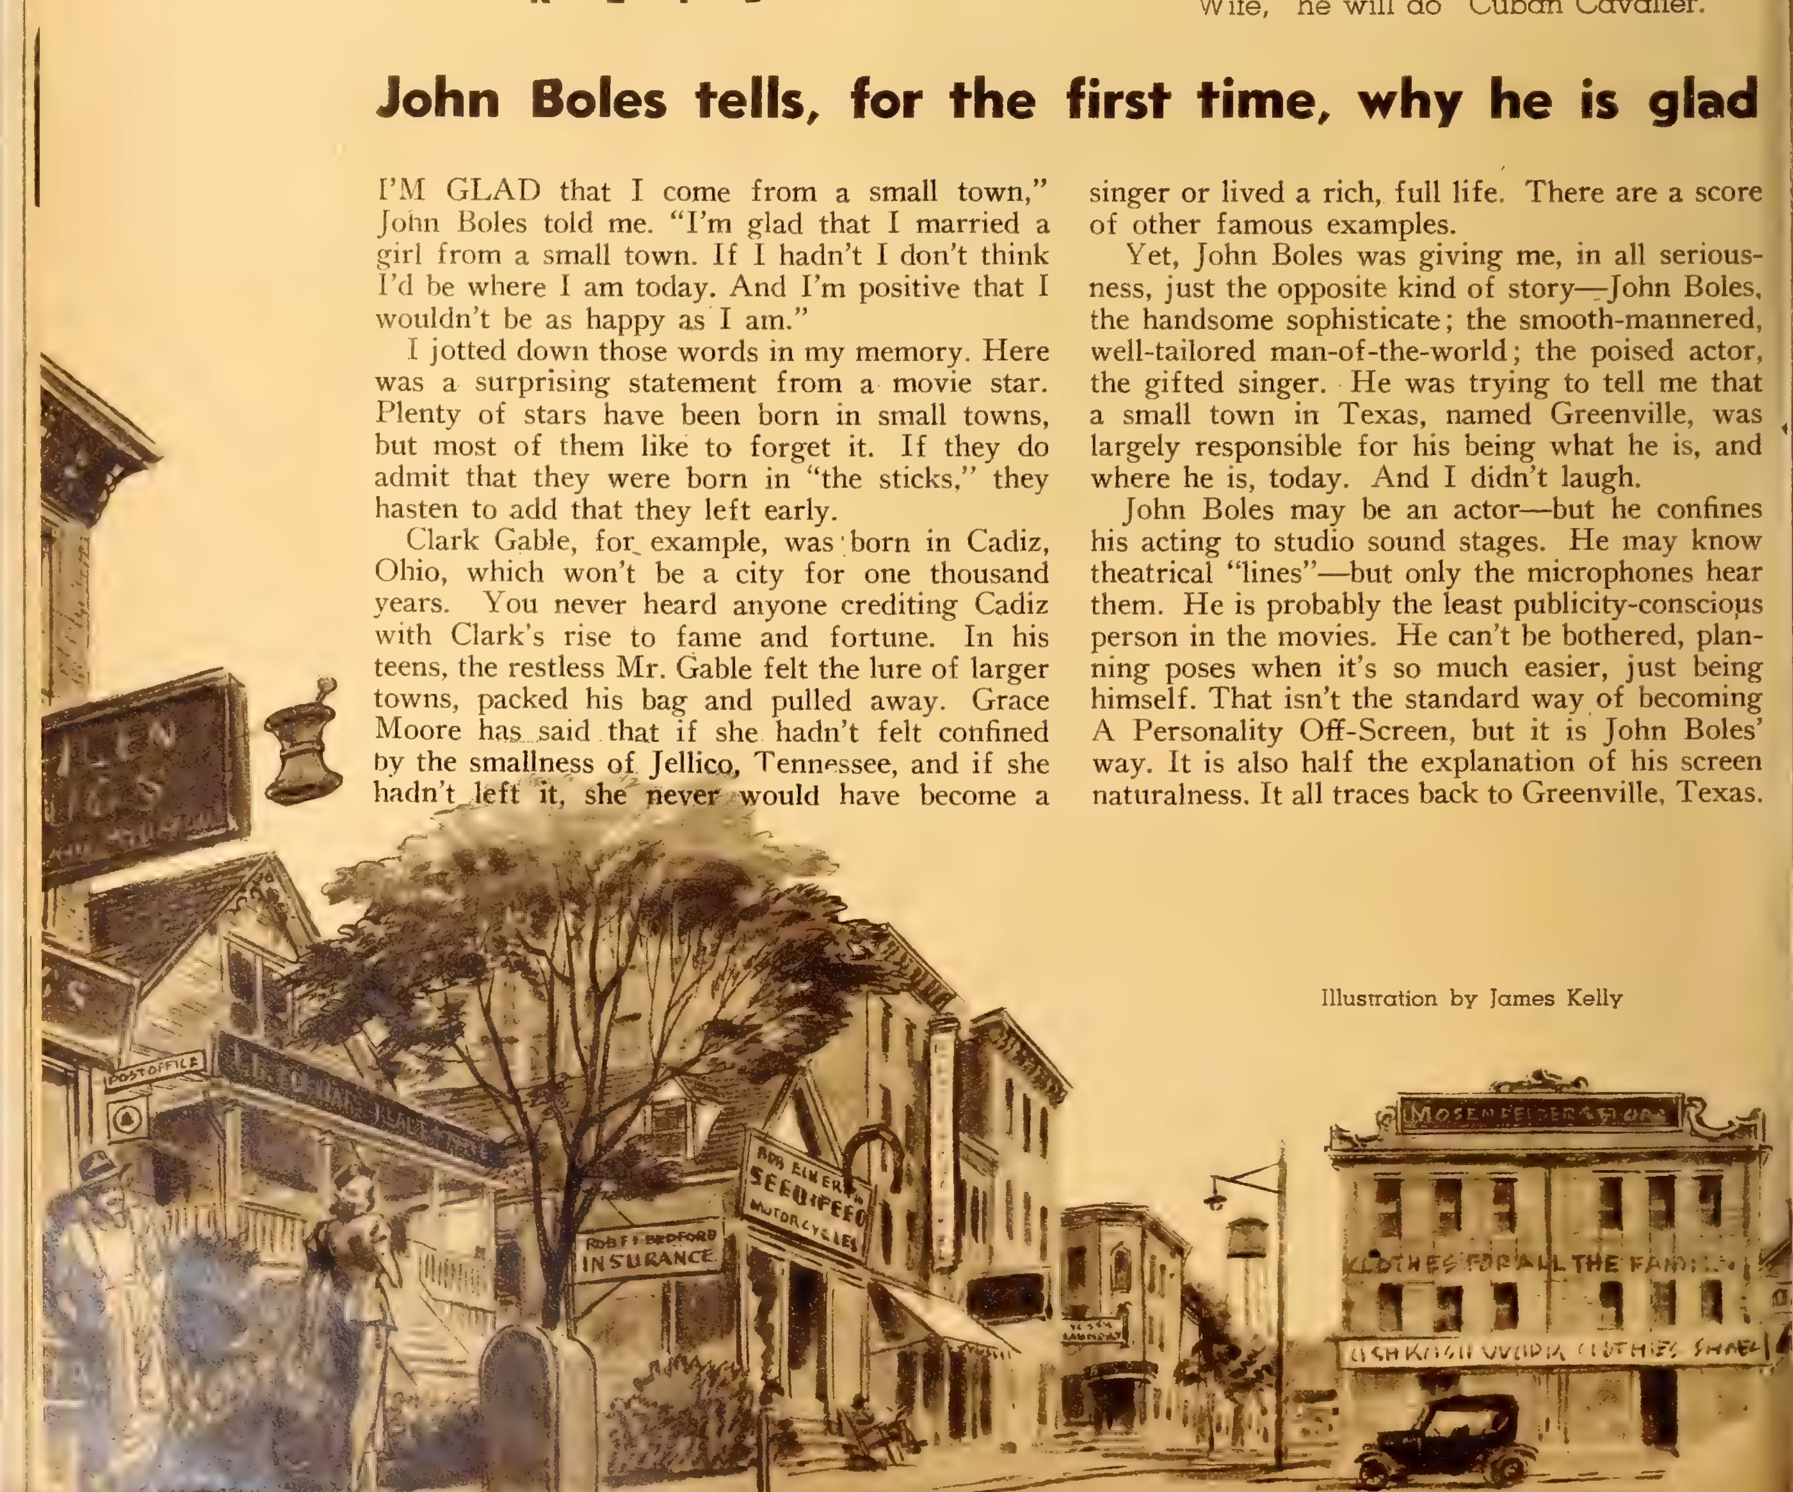

Illustration by James Kelly

Boles and his young daughter, Marcelite, are a familiar duo at Hollywood sports events. A friend of Miss M.'s is with them.

John Boles claims that one reason why his marriage is a success is because Marcelite Dobbs, his wife, is a small-towner, too.

he's not a city slicker stepping out on gay Mazda Lane

I pried into the reasons behind his attitude toward the old home town, after he made that statement.

"Well," he said, "I suppose one of the reasons why I had a good time in Greenville was that Greenville is in Texas. There's a lot of Texas in my blood. Both my mother and father were born there, and they couldn't imagine any better place to live. Neither could I, unless it's California.

"There's something about that Texas country that makes a man feel at home there. Maybe it's the air. It isn't damp and cold; it doesn't give a man ideas that a change of climate would be good for him. Maybe it's the vastness of the country. There aren't any narrow horizons. Just step outside a town, almost anywhere in the state, and you can see ten miles ahead. You can't feel cramped in country like that. Or maybe it's because people are just naturally friendly there, with towns ten and twenty miles apart. If there's anything about you to like, a Texan will find it. You can't build up any hallucinations that maybe people would like you better elsewhere."

He paused, as if to ask if he were making himself clear—to an Easterner. After all, we were a long way from Texas, sitting in a suite in the Hotel Plaza in New York City—not too high to escape the rhythm of the traffic. This was the place where the movies had found him. But that was not through any of John's planning, I discovered. It took several whirls of the wheel of chance to get him away from the Lone Star State.

"Texas looked pretty good to me," John continued, smiling that famous, friendly Boles smile. "And plenty big enough for my ambitions. I wasn't just sure what I wanted to be, but I felt that I'd have plenty of room to spread out. And, on top of everything else, I didn't have a chance to feel restless at home; I had too good a time there.

"Dad made a pretty good income, and we didn't live right up to it, as we might have in a city. In a small town, there's less vanity, less 'keeping up with the Joneses.' That's another thing I like about it. Nine out of ten, a man in a small town, earning her

You will be as amazed

BY FRANC DILLON

As Merle appears in "Love and War."

AT THIS late day it would be a trifle ambiguous to tell you that Merle Oberon is a success in motion pictures. But what made her a success, will she marry handsome David Niven and when, what sort of a future has she to anticipate and what part the stars in the heavens played in helping her to be a great actress, is an entirely different matter. It was purely accidental that I learned the answer to these questions.

I don't know any more about astrology than you do, but according to Mabel Walrath Smith, Hollywood's pet astrologer, the position of the planets at the moment of your birth has everything to do with what will happen to you when you reach Hollywood, Lacrosse, Kansas, or Salem, Oregon, or wherever your big life work happens to be. Whether you believe in it or not, Hollywood does and it's a rare day when some motion picture star, writer or producer doesn't visit Mrs. Smith's studio.

BETWEEN pictures Merle Oberon spends most of her play time on an old fishing barge just off the coast of Santa Monica, but on this particular day the stars were good to me and as I passed her dressing-room at United Artists studios, I heard a voice that I immediately recognized as Mrs. Smith's saying, "Your chart is 80 per cent good and that's very unusual."

It's fascinating to listen to her telling people what the stars did or should have done for them. I couldn't pass up a good story so I knocked on the door and begged to be allowed to listen. There were no objections.

"This girl has the best chart of any star in Hollywood," Mrs. Smith said to me, and added, "If there is a better one I haven't seen it and I've cast most of them."

Only a few days before Merle had declared very forcibly that women shouldn't have careers.

"This is no business for any woman to be in," Merle protested, bringing up the subject again. "Hurrying to get to the studio, worrying over contracts, fighting with producers, working till all hours. I should be home having children."

"Oh, but you will have children," Mrs. Smith interrupted. "Your chart very clearly proclaims you a true mother as well as a successful actress. You must have children to complete your circle of happiness. There are three indicated in your chart but they may not all be your own. You may adopt one."

"Do tell me when I'm going to get married," Miss Oberon begged, apparently thinking that marriage should come before the children.

"Would I be happy married to a person born in March?" she asked. But not being sure of the exact date, her secretary immediately began a telephone search for David Niven, the young man under consideration.

WHILE THEY waited for the necessary information, the reading continued. According to Mrs. Smith, the planets couldn't have been better behaved than they were when the little star was born. Everything was propitious to guarantee her the brilliant future she is just beginning to realize.

Estelle Merle O'Brien Thompson was born in Hobart, on the tiny Island of Tasmania, on February 19, under the Sign of Aquarius. So were George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Clark Gable and many other famous people. So many great men of science were born under this sign that it is often referred to as the "scientific sign of the Zodiac."

Venus, the Goddess of Love, has showered gifts on her with a lavish hand. It is the aspect of Venus to her first house that denotes a beautiful countenance, reflecting gentle thoughts. But more than that she is also endowed with that elusive something called charm.

Remember Maggie's description of it in the play, "What Every Woman Knows"? "If you have it, you don't need to have anything else. And if you don't have it, it doesn't much matter what else you have."

But Venus, in a generous mood, gave Merle many other qualities to make her the fascinating person she is. The dreamy expression in her eyes, however, was a gift from Neptune.

SHE HAS a somewhat romantic outlook on life, but while she is affectionate, she has a great deal of self-control. She will expect her mate to lavish his love upon her, however, and he will. But when her love has cooled toward someone and she detaches herself from him, no one else can ever fill her place in his life. She never tires you; in fact her company is always desirable.

Ruling the emotional nature, Venus makes her a bit capricious at times in her likes and dislikes, and in case

as was Merle Oberon to learn what the stars predict for her she sees too much of a person (unless she is very fond of him or her), she may become temporarily indifferent or bored.

"Barring accidents, you will live to be very old and can be a star to the end of your days if you wish," Mrs. Smith declared.

"I certainly don't want to," protested Merle. "I want to work just long enough to earn sufficient money to raise and educate my children. I don't want to work any longer than necessary and I want children more than anything in the world."

"But when you retire from acting you could and will become a producer," Mrs. Smith told her. "You may act in your own pictures."

Merle thought she would like very much, "Being out of it but not in it," as she expressed it.

AT HEART she is an aristocrat. She is the type who can speak the truth—even if it hurts—in a gracious, courteous manner, without making enemies. Mercury's aspect to the midheaven and to Neptune indicates a fertile mentality and strong imagination. There is a minor aspect to Mercury, which indicates some worry at times, but the same aspect enables her to think deeply and will spur her on to even greater accomplishment. Although she is very feminine, she thinks like a man.

The position of Mars denotes considerable initiative; an inner aggressiveness and driving power, which enable her to get what she wants. Endurance, tenacity and tremendous ambition are also strong in her make-up. She has a terrific, quiet power within her that is all compelling. If she came into a room where there were a hundred people, she would command the immediate attention of everyone without making a sound or lifting a finger.

The ability to realize her ambitions through courage and tenacity, to lay her plans and carry them through, has been well illustrated in her life so far. At seventeen, having graduated from La Martinere College in Calcutta, India, she decided she would become a motion picture actress.

"I wasn't stage-struck, really," she told me in her clipped British accent. "That is, not any more than any other seventeen-year-old girl is, but I decided that being an actress was the (Continued on page 80) meet the wife . . . !

BY KAY OSBORNE

There are many good reasons why everyone is predicting happy days for Fred MacMurray and his brand-new, beautiful bride.

SUPPOSE your best beau were suddenly whisked right off good old terra firma and ensconced star-high in a cinema sky—what would you—and he—do about it? Would the rarefied atmosphere go to his head, and would your heart go to your boots? Nine times out of ten, most certainly! Suppose your Johnny, Jim, or Tim, were suddenly catapulted from your unglamorous arms to the siren ones of such beauties as Carole Lombard, Claudette Colbert, Katharine Hepburn and—more dangerous—to the siren arms of more than a thousand dollars a week. What kind of "ye olde fighte" would you put up? The wrong kind probably.

Listen, then—for it well might happen to you—how two people did survive the greatest of all romance obstacles, stardom, to a happy "I pronounce you man and wife" finish.

That day, back in New York, in the summer of 1934, when Fred MacMurray told Lillian Lamont that Paramount and he had finally signed a contract, Lillian's heart did not drop to her boots as you might expect. It soared with his honestly, sincerely, unselfishly. "Oh, darling, it's wonderful. I know you'll succeed!" No tears for the parting to come. No "Promise me you'll write, promise you won't forget me!" Not a word about their engagement. Not even by inference did she display a sense of possession. She did not advise him how he should behave "out there," nor did she suggest clothes to be taken with him.

THEY SPENT their last evening together as they had spent many evenings. After the last curtain of "Roberta"—Lillian was a model in that show, Fred a band musician—they met at the stage door, walked over to Times Square, wandered into their favorite sea-food restaurant, split a large red lobster between them, and Lillian ordered a tall glass of iced tea. As she sat there straw-sipping it, Fred began to sing softly and whimsically,

It took Fred MacMurray nearly three years to get Lillian Lamont to say "yes," but he finally succeeded.

Lillian Lamont's (now Mrs. MacM.) brains have stood her in good stead during her two years in Hollywood.

"Prettieth little girl I ever thaw Thippin' thider through a thwa-aw-aw."

Lillian laughed. "Goof!" It was the only reference to their love-agreement. Though a little later, after Fred had "walked" her home, and they stood at her door, he did say, "As soon as I get a little money ahead I'll send for you, Lily." Her eyes flashed. "Not on your life. Don't even say a thing like that. Makes me feel like a peasant sweetheart left behind 'in the old country.' When I get enough money ahead I'll come out!"

If your beau became a screen idol overnight, how would you handle the situation —and marry him, too?

So Lillian put into practice her first "Don't be a hanger-on!" rule. When Lillian arrived here a month or so after Fred, she had already "cinched" a modeling job at a well known Hollywood shop. "I wouldn't have come to Hollywood without a job for anything," she says.

What's more she lived on and within that salary—in a town where to spend more than you make is the greatest temptation. She took a small unfurnished apartment near the shop so she could be within walking distance. She did not buy a car, though everyone told her, "You simply can't get along here without a car. Simply can't, that's all!" She sent back East for her furniture, and had it shipped out the cheapest way, by slow boat freight. Her furniture is typical of Lillian. Early American, the real thing—not cheap veneer imitations. When it arrived she realized that she lacked only one thing to make her apartment complete—a small breakfast set for her dinette. Fred surprised her with one. That and the tiny diamond engagement ring he gave her this last Christmas were the only gifts she would ever accept from him.

You must have many questions—questions you would ask yourself in the same situation, with a best beau rising rapidly to stardom. Anticipating some of them, they are:

To visit or not to visit him on the set? Lillian answered this one in the negative: True a visit on the set could be explained as nothing more or less than a proper interest in Fred's work. But it might also be construed as something else—eagle-eyed jealousy. Lillian preferred not to run that risk, even at the sacrifice of what would have been a pleasure to any girl. For two years Lillian stayed away from Fred at work and it wasn't until after her appendicitis operation this spring that Fred finally insisted on her presence. She was recuperating at Leslie and Ann (Dvorak) Fenton's ranch when Fred went to Gallup, New Mexico, on location for "The Texas Rangers." Knowing that the clear air and sunshine would put the bloom back into Lillian's cheeks he sent for her. And she went, for there only the desert could see her pride in the tall young man who was riding swiftly to even greater fame.

What to do about Hollywood curiosity? Since the day when Fred first became "news"—after the preview of "The Gilded Lily"—news-will you take a dare for Beauty!?

Introducing Mary Marshall

For some time, in the city where she lives, Mary Marshall has been carrying on a unique kind of beauty culture. She owns no shop with a fancy name on the plate glass window. She lives in an apartment and has a husband and a baby and a household to run. A great portion of her time, however, goes in helping people to be better looking.

It started with her friends. Then the friends brought their friends and acquaintances and so on. She helps them to get slim or plumper, as the case may be, tells them what to do about their hair and fixes their faces up and all that sort of thing. She has, literally, worked miracles—and has asked not one thin dime in payment. She's a personal friend of mine and I told her that was pretty silly and wouldn't she write some articles for MODERN SCREEN? She said yes. I asked her, too, if she'd answer, personally, letters from you on problems of diet, exercise, make-up, hair-dos, charm, poise and all the rest of those things which go toward making a pretty girl beautiful and a beautiful girl irresistible. She said yes, again. So here she is, and it's up to you to take advantage of her good nature!

—The Editor

THE TROUBLE is, with this beauty stuff, that many of you know what you ought to do, but you don't do it. The beauty-writing clan has tapped out on its typewriters enough appeals to your common sense and to your desire for the rewards which a slim figure, a pretty face, and a smart, trim, chic appearance bring into your lives—enough appeals, I say, to fill a couple of libraries. I shall start my little course of lectures on a different tack: I dare you to make a good earnest bid for beauty! I'll bet you you can*not* be one hundred per cent better looking six months from now! There! Maybe that's rash and not so tactful, but maybe it will get some results.

Having commenced in this high-horsey vein, let me hasten to turn around and say something nice, lest you think me a very disagreeable woman, indeed. I'll help you on this dare, if you want me to. For example:

Let's say that, knowing in your bones that you should go on a diet to lose or gain weight—either one—you have not as yet made any effort in that direction, for one reason or another. Perhaps you

MARY MARSHALL

Our expert tells how these four stars won beauty bets. She challenges you to do the same—and you can by taking her advice heartily detest most of the foods prescribed on most diets. Perhaps you think it would be terribly inconvenient, in your household, to try a diet. Whatever the reason, do this: send me a list of the things you've eaten and drunk for the last week. Breakfast, luncheon and dinner—and don't leave out the in-between snacks, if any. If you can't remember accurately enough, start today and keep a record for a week. Send this list to me, in care of MODERN SCREEN, and write down, too, your age, height and weight, and your bust, waist and hip measurements. Tell me, also, the foods you like best and the foods you simply cannot eat—or think you can't. I'll plan a personal diet for you, as fast as I can open the letters and type out the answers. That will start you out in the right direction, and next month I'll have another personal service stunt ready for you. Please enclose a stamped, return envelope in your letter to me. Do be honest about this and don't forget, accidentally on purpose, to include the fattening things you've been eating, for instance, which you know you "hadn't oughter." Don't try to impress me with this list. I don't want to be impressed—I want to help.

WHAT'S MY reason for going to all this trouble—trouble to you, and trouble to me, too, b'gosh? This is the reason: I hear people, constantly, saying, "I don't see why I don't lose!" Or, "I don't see why I don't gain!" Mark my words—there is a reason, always, barring glandular difficulties to be found in the food you put in your stomachs. Lumps and bulges can be taken off by exercise; downright overweight and underweight come from eating too much, too little, or the wrong foods. And now let's speak of other things.

My ideas about this beauty business might be summed up as follows: to correct any fault of figure or face, nothing is too much trouble. People should be ready to spend time, effort, thought and money, if they can spare it, to slim down or round out a figure, to slice down bulges, to clear up a bad skin and to improve dopey looking hair. The superficialities of beauty—the make-up, the hair-dos, the

Joan Crawford has to fight weight constantly, but you'd never suspect it.

John Beal is one movie actor who is in constant demand for both stage and screen roles, and above, he's snapped with Anne Shirley during the filming of "M'liss."

two - career guy

Meet John Beal, who is picturedom's perennial "new face"

PERHAPS most people don't take movie scouts with their constant cry for new faces seriously, but John Beal is not one of these. His unique attitude may prove one of his claims to fame, but the fact is John not only heard and heeded the "scout cry," but went even further and planned his life and career according to its dictates.

"It's an old and true saying," John recalls, "that grass never grows on a busy street and that is a reason why I'm a part-time guy in the movies and in the theatre both. They're constantly shouting for new faces, so when I finish a picture in Hollywood, I immediately grab a train for New York. When I arrive in the seething city, I do a play and, with the first sign of its decline in popularity, I return to the Coast and the sound stages.

"But the gag is that by the time I get back, the casting men have forgotten me, so I'm practically just what the director ordered—a new face. Then, when I've finished a picture or two, my brand-new face returns to the Broadway stage."

You will have to admit that young Mr. Beal has a well-thought-out design for living—and it's practical, too. Scarcely ten years ago, John left Joplin, Mo., to enroll at the University of Pennsylvania. During his scholastic training there he joined the Mask and Wig, as famous a dramatic organization as the Yale Puppeteers.

Distinguishing himself in the professionally-turned-out amateur plays, he soon found himself hunted and haunted by those hounds of the Hollywood hills, the talent scouts. It is part of the duties of this gentry to descend upon little theatre groups annually with proffers and promises of California gelt for those who can withstand the more or less rigorous test of sound and celluloid.

Mrs. George MacDonald—Jean Parker to you —with her handsome, new husband.

Here is Jean Parker, as sweet as she is pretty, and as sensible as she is sweet.

jean grows up

Little Miss Parker knows that you also can make your dreams come true

BY MARY SHARON

JEAN PARKER is married. This, in itself, warrants a story. Yet, the real story of Jean, as she is today, must detail the incidents and adventures that have come into her life during this exciting last year, before her marriage to good-looking, young George Macdonald. Idealistic as her romantic marriage has been, it is really only one vital link in the chain of development that has brought her from girlhood to wifehood.

Jean is an anomaly. Not yet twenty-one, she has the poise and assurance of a woman of thirty, yet she has managed to keep her dreams intact.

We talked in her dressing-room, where she was being fitted for the costumes she wears in "The Texas Rangers." So much has happened since our last visit together, and the sum total of these happenings have made a young lady of Jean.

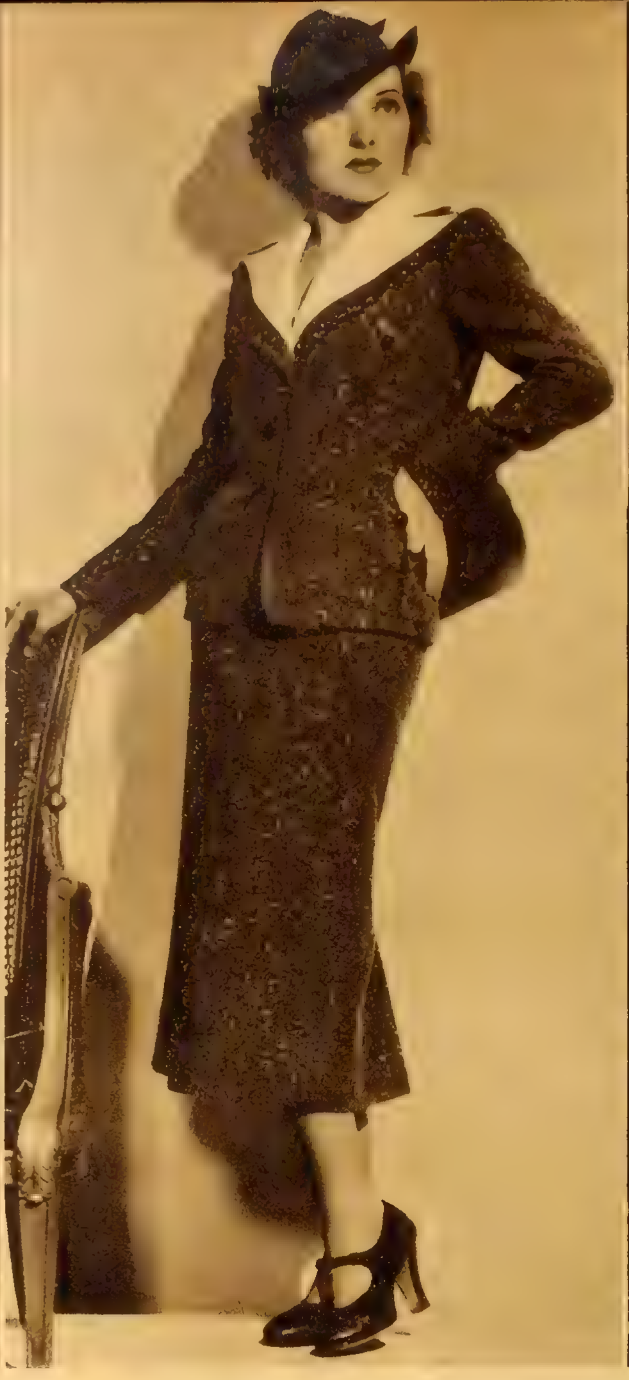
"Jean, you've grown up!" I accused her.

"Is that a crime?" she asked, laughing. "I would hate to think that these last seven months have left me the same girl I was before they came along."

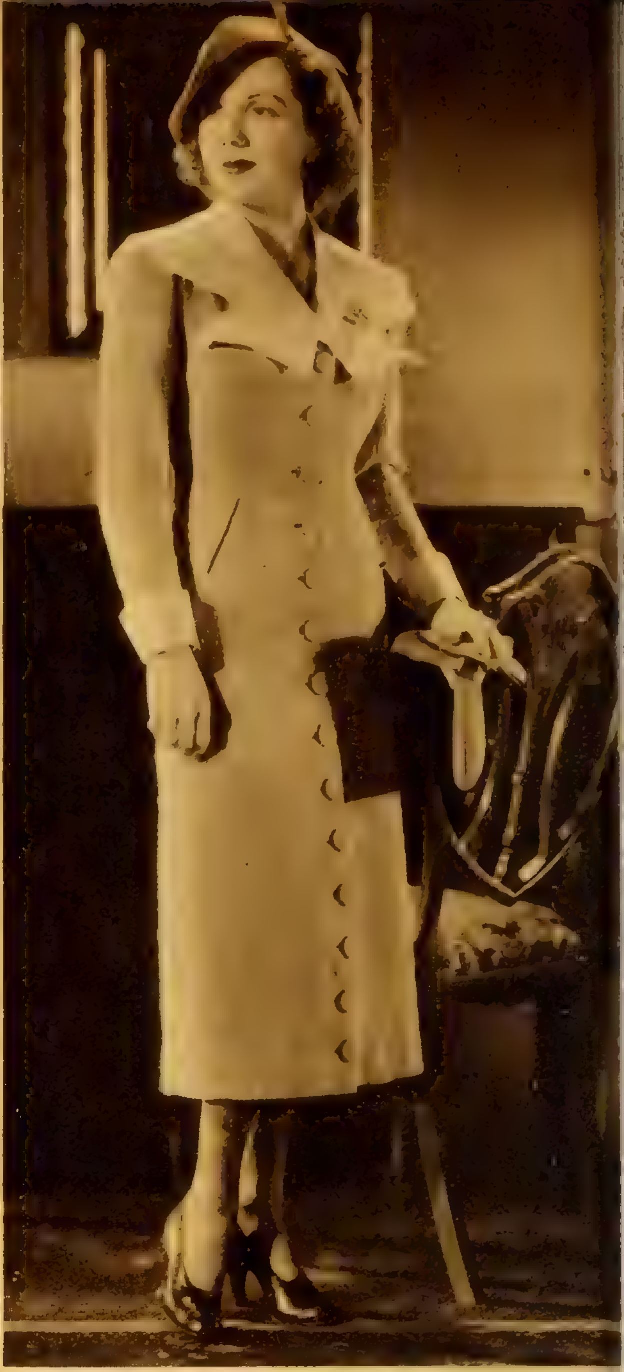
Certainly, no girl has ever lived through a more joyously exciting period. Seven months ago, the studio called Jean on the 'phone and asked her to prepare for a hurried trip to London. An agreement had been accepted by cable for her to appear opposite Robert Donat in "The Ghost Goes West."

Jean was thrilled at the news, for she had dreamed of going abroad some day to work in pictures. What thrilled her quite as much, was the news that she would be Donat's leading lady, for he has been her favorite actor even since he appeared in "The Private Life of Henry VIII." So many things she had (Continued on page 78)

Simone Simon wears a young and very charming gray wool crepe dress embroidered in chenille. The fitted bodice and wide skirt are new. Silver stars for buttons and belt trim.



Pat Paterson's trim green tweed suit is flecked in white and the white accent is further stressed by the becoming collar worn out over the jacket. Pat's accessories are black.



A classic type of coat dress in gray woolen checked in white is Louise Latimer's first fall buy. The wide white collar is unusual. Her accessories are in a darker shade of gray.

THE MORE I read your interesting letters, the more certain I am that none of you is interested in tossing your money away on the passing whims of fashion. What you want are good clothes of real quality and smart design that will go through one or several seasons of steady wear without getting that last year's hangover look.

Fall probably is the hardest time of the year for economical shopping. In the first place, if you buy a new coat, you can't skimp on good material or fur—if you do, you are throwing away your hard-earned money. And when you buy a dress, no matter to what practical purpose it is to be put, it takes much more thought and care in selecting than a spring print or a summer cotton. While you definitely want new fabric and color interest, you also want something that will be versatile enough to edge in on all sorts of activities. And you want it at a price.

It's an old saw to repeat that quality is more to be desired than quantity—yet year in and out it is proved that this is one of the soundest of the fashion axioms. It's one that you'll find every really smart Hollywood star dressing by.

Putting your money down on a first fall outfit isn't unlike a good bet in a horse race—you wonder whether your entry will win, place or merely show. You certainly don't want to just "show," so shop with an eye to picking a winner. The whole trick is to get a few of the top fashion trends in mind, then you are not so likely to be carried away with the first bright color you see or the flashiest fabric in the place! On the other hand, you

MRS. NICHOLAS GRIFFITH PENNIMAN III

Mrs. Penniman is a descendant of two signers of the Declaration of Independence. Another forefather was one of the founders of the Bachelors' Cotillion, exclusive to Baltimore's first families. Mrs. Penniman is widely known as a charming hostess, a genius in fine Southern cookery. "When entertaining," she says, "I always serve plenty of Camels. Smoking Camels between meals and after has a welcome effect on digestion

The excitement of having a good time—whether at home or "abroad"—often keys up the nervous system. Tenseness results, slowing down the activity of digestive fluids.

Scientists have shown that the supply of these fluids—alkaline digestive fluids—is helped back to normal by smoking Camels. Definitely, Camels encourage good digestion . . . give a generous "lift." Their costlier tobaccos furnish a fitting accompaniment to the subtle flavors of fine food. Being mild, Camels never tire your taste. So, hostess or guest, let Camels give you pleasure during meals and after. They set you right!

Good Looks start UNDER your Skin...
BLACKHEADS are discouraged
PORES look smaller
LINES fade

Miss Katharine Aldridge—"I keep my pores fine, skin fresh looking, with Pond's Cold Cream."

When you keep your UNDER SKIN working

YOU can have the prettiest features in the world—but if your skin is spotty with little faults, nobody calls you "a pretty girl."

And girls with less claim to good features are "good looking"—simply because they have a clear, fresh skin!

You can have a clear, fresh skin, too! Fight lines and blackheads and coarse pores where they start—just under your skin!

Rousing . . . deep down!

Skin faults appear when tiny hidden glands, blood vessels and cells in your underskin function poorly. It's their work to keep your outer skin glowing and young. You must keep them at it! And you can—by faithful use of Pond's invigorating deep-skin treatment.

Most faults start underneath

Below that dark layer are tiny glands, cells, fibres which keep your outer skin flawless. When they function poorly—skin faults start!

Pond's Cold Cream, with its specially processed oils, travels deep into the pores. Right away it floats out the dirt. Your skin feels wonderfully clean—is wonderfully clean!

Now pat in more Pond's Cold Cream for a brisk, rousing deep-skin treatment. Feel the blood tingling? . . . Face glowing? A sign you're rousing lazy glands, cells, blood vessels to a fresh start!

Do this regularly. Note the quick improvement! At once your color is livened. Your skin is toned. Soon pores are looking smaller, lines softening into smooth skin. Those blackheads you used to dread, come less and less.

Mrs. William Jay Iselin
"Pond's Cold Cream leaves my skin toned up—glowing! I never have blackheads and blemishes."

Remember this

Here's the simple daily treatment worked out by Pond's. It does more than cleanse your skin.

Every night, pat in Pond's Cold Cream to loosen dirt, make-up. Wipe it all off. Pat in more cream briskly—to rouse your underskin, keep it working properly, so annoying little faults can't spoil your looks.

Every morning, and during the day, repeat this treatment with Pond's Cold Cream. Your skin becomes softer every time—smoother for powder. You are pretty now—simply because your skin is so good looking!

Start in at once. The coupon brings a special 9-treatment tube of Pond's Cold Cream.

SPECIAL 9-TREATMENT TUBE

Gee I'm happy! I've had my MENNEN OIL RUB like hospitals give

"Pardon my enthusiasm—but I can't help bubbling over with satisfaction. Why? 'Cause mother just gave me my daily body rub with Mennen Oil. That's the Antiseptic oil they use in hospitals.*And boy, do germs hate it! As near as I can figure out, this oil covers me with a film of safety . . . from head to foot. It gets down into my skin folds and creases . . . where germs love to hide and start trouble. My doctor says that Mennen Oil keeps me safer and healthier. Am I glad? Gosh, yes. And your baby will be, too, if you rub him daily with Mennen Antiseptic Oil."

A kingdom all his own

What a grand start a modern youngster gets! Everything specially for him . . . even a special laxative!

MOTHER . . . Isn't it logical that a baby will thrive best on special care? After all, his system is a delicate thing. Tender. Still growing.

That's why you probably have a special baby tub for your baby . . . use special soap . . . special powder . . . and a special food formula, of course.

Doctors say the same logic should follow in the laxative field. They say a baby should have a special laxative, too. For it stands to reason that if his system is too delicate for adult food, it is also too delicate for "adult" laxatives! That's why doctors recommend Fletcher's Castoria—the laxative made especially and only for children.

Fletcher's Castoria is mild . . . gentle . . . and above all, SAFE. It will never upset your baby's stomach because it works chiefly in the lower bowel. It won't cause cramping pains because it contains no harsh drugs.

It contains no purging irritants—no narcotics—nothing that could harm the tiniest infant system. In fact, a famous child specialist said he couldn't write a better prescription than Fletcher's Castoria.

You'll be glad to know that children love the taste of Fletcher's Castoria. They take it willingly—without the least complaint. And that is most important. Because, as you know, the fight a child puts up against a laxative he hates can upset his entire nervous and digestive system!

Chas H. Fletcher

CASTORIA

The laxative made especially for babies and growing children

So, mother, think twice when your child next needs a laxative. Give him the laxative millions of mothers have faith in . . . the laxative made especially for children . . . FLETCHER'S CASTORIA. Thousands of doctors prescribe it. Every drug store sells it. Why not get the economical Family-Size bottle tonight—it saves you money. The signature Chas. H. Fletcher appears on every carton.

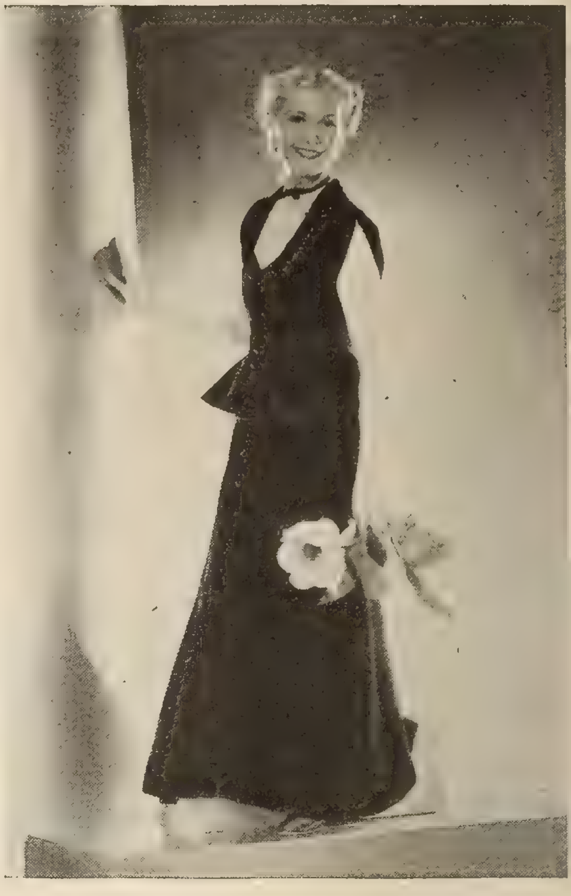
Left, Olivia de Havilland wears Orry-Kelly's copy of her screen costume. In lustre satin, he has changed the girdle of his original sketch, shown last month, adding striking clips instead.

Right, Anita Louise in the adaptation of her loveliest costume from the picture. It is made of velvet with the new flaring peplum silhouette and a metal lace vestee. Both dresses given by Studio Styles.



It's not too late to win one of nine handsome prizes!

You'll have difficulty deciding which you would rather win for they are all stunning and are made in the richest fabrics and trimmings of the new season. Studio Styles, Inc., gives them away as the first four prizes in this exciting contest.

And not only these dresses as prizes but five additional ones including a big, thousand people. Behind the soccer enterprise was still another thought. He wanted to raise money for his private charity—which is the feeding of families who are unable to buck the red tape of organized charity, and so do not get fed. With the money, earned during the period of half a year, he fed seventeen thousand persons last Christmas day. His meat bill alone was $5,183.

From that nucleus has developed the Sports Center, where amateurs of all persuasions may meet, train, practise and compete. The onlooker may behold two hundred and fifty mounted cavalrymen on parade, one hundred and fifty Red Cross workers at work, one hundred and eighty Boy Scouts drilling football, baseball and soccer players in action, the Flying Escadrille tuning up—and Victor supervises it all, paying for everything but asking nothing other than that the boys behave themselves and put things where they belong.

And now, additionally, Victor has set apart $1,000 for an experimental laboratory which he plans to turn over to licensed radio amateurs. He is establishing a club of short-wave radio operators as another unit of his Center. He is recruiting a group of fifty licensed youths for whom he will erect a separate club house equipped with lathes, electrical meters and gadgets, complete broadcasting and receiving equipment. He is quoted as saying, "I plan to train the boys to be of assistance to Los Angeles in the case of some major disaster. I believe that radio amateurs comprise the finest element of American youth, and because I am personally interested in them, I would like to see them work out their problems in an efficient and complete laboratory." And he added, "All that I ask is that I be allowed to stick my nose into their radio shack from time to time to observe how they are getting along."

He believes that the survival of the fittest is the law of life, always has been and always will be. And that the law of love is for the fit to help those less fit in the difficult business of surviving. "We are," said Victor, "our brothers' keepers."

Victor talked of human beings. As he talked he walked, up and down the narrow confines of his dressing-room, every now and again driving his clenched fist into the open palm of his hand, the gesture he used so often as "The Informer"—a gesture which is habitual with him. He was saying that we have not, really, emerged from barbarism. There are still strange places on the earth's surface where men and women are not yet civilized, where they are still in the process of adaptation to their environment. There is cannabalism. And he said, "And we, who think ourselves so civilized, so enlightened—when we compare ourselves to the Neanderthal—have we progressed so far? We have invented words to play with. We have built clever toys. We have more skillful tools to work with. But basically—what do we wear, still, upon our feet? The hides of animals, don't we? And upon our bodies, for clothes and for adornment, we still wear the wool from the sheep, the hide of the leopard, the pelt of the fox and the raccoon, the feathers from birds, the scales of the snake and the fish. We still eat the flesh of animals whose circulatory blood system is the same as our own. We still kill, some of us, when our mate is taken from us. We still pray to our gods to feed and clothe us.

IS war barbarism or not? Aren't we still plotting and planning ways and means of torturing, of annihilating our fellow men? And in the most monstrous and hideous ways possible and for the same age-old reasons?

"Did the Saints, the early Christian martyrs, suffer more than our cancer victims? Did barbarism know any agony more prolonged, more barbaric, than the sufferings of our unemployed, our misfits who go through years and years of starvation?

"Do our gods grant us much more of bounty and beneficence than did the gods of old? In Ireland, I know, people live under conditions which would not be borne by a pig. They pray, they spend their lives on their knees—but they still eat potatoes, if at all.

"I might be called a pagan, an agnostic," said Victor. "I only know this world. I am not worrying about the next. I also know that, for the most part, men who do not know are kinder than those who say they do. Perhaps it is because we realize that this little human family of us all is here for only a short span of life—and why not be kind to each other, why not be tolerant for that little time?

"When Luther Burbank was asked what he thought about the world to come, he said something to the effect that this world was so beautiful, so bountiful, he had no time to worry about other worlds to come. If they did come, that would be all right. But if they did not, then this world had been beautiful and fulfilling enough. He loved life, all of it. He had his work to do and he had done it to the best of his ability. The fruits of his labor were spread over the surface of the earth he loved—and it was enough.

"And it is enough for me," said Victor, stopping his pacing for a moment, gazing out at the golden sun over the shadowy hills. "That is, roughly, my credo."

"Out of it all," I said, "what is the best thing in life, do you think? What is the best thing your life has given you?"

"My children," said Victor McLaglen, with such sincerity and simplicity as raised a lump in my throat. "I am in love with my children. The only reason other things matter is because they may, in one way or another, profit my children. Well, they're all we have, you know. To equip them for life is the best we can do and it is what we are here for. There is nothing more worth while.

"My boy Andrew is fifteen. My girl Sheila is twelve. And they have more than lived up to every one of my expectations. They are truthful, honest and loyal. That is all that matters.

"I have never raised a hand to either one of them, in all their lives. I have never raised my voice to them. I have never had to speak to them twice. They have done everything I ever hoped they would do and they are everything I ever hoped they would be. Andrew is a fine scholar and an athlete. He is taller than I am right now. He will be taller than any of the McLaglens. Though he doesn't look much like me in the face," smiled Victor, "he's good looking. And his spirit is as sturdy and upstanding as his body.

"Sheila is an equally fine scholar and athlete. She is a charming little hostess. She is a lady. I get a kick out of going home unexpectedly on occasional afternoons and, unbeknown to her, I'll watch her serving tea to her friends and I'll stand there, grinning to myself, proud as Punch of her poise and graciousness.

"I HAVE tried, with everything in me, to be a good father to them. I believe they love me, not only because I am their father but also because I am their friend—and they know it. I never coerce them in any way. I never say 'Don't,' or 'You can't.' They may read what they please, believe as they please, choose what they want to do in life.

"I would not want my son to lead the life I led as a youth, nor to do many of the things I've done. I am ashamed of many of them. I can only hope that, by using some of my experiences as warning and wisdom for my son, I may be justified. I try to give him everything good I have done and learned and thought—everything bad I try to keep from him, save as the knowledge I gained may serve him."

And I wish that I might write what Victor told me about the way he has instructed his son. I can't. It's too intimate. But every father in the land would profit by it and every son would grow to hold manhood high and womanhood sacred if they could grow by Victor's measuring rod.

He has made it his pride and passion in life to give his children the right kind of a home—the beautiful place in the La Crescenta hills—the right kind of background. He hopes that his daughter will not, when the time comes, make the mistake of marrying some futile, unworthy fellow. It would break his heart, he said, if she should ever have to worry about whether the rent was paid or not—all of her bright cherished youth gone dull and gray from nagging worries. And he hopes that the right schools and right associates will give her a standard from which she will not deviate later on.

"They love their mother," Victor told me, "and they love me—that makes a home. The love of a mother for her children," he added, "the love of a father for his children is the only real love."

Then, and only then, did we mention "The Informer" and the Academy prize about which I had thought we would talk most of the time. Victor is proud of the prize. He is pleased. There is enough of the boy in him still to cherish trophies and awards. But he said, "It was the easiest part I ever played. And John Ford says it was the easiest picture he ever had to direct. Shakespeare was right, you know, when he said 'the play's the thing.' It's the whole thing. You can't do something with nothing, you know. An actor has got to have a part he can get his teeth into. It's far harder work to stand around with nothing worth while to do, with no lines to say worth saying, than it is to play a part like 'The Informer.' That meant something.

"Now, of course," laughed Victor, "the real work begins—the effort to find the right stories for me. It may sound funny, but I don't think they've ever understood me before in the studios. I don't want to play Shakespeare, haven't the slightest desire to go highbrow. I'd like to do the life of John L. Sullivan, or play Bill Sikes—characters with blood and bones and a reason for being. I like my work. I like acting. Mostly because it's given me the ability to do what I've wanted to do for my family. And when I get a part like 'The Informer' it's sufficient unto itself. I don't know what I'm to do next. They've rented me out here at Twentieth Century-Fox to Universal. The story's called 'The Magnificent Brute,' said Victor. "The work I do makes possible for me the only important thing in my life—the right kind of life for my children."

dreamed of doing became a reality on this trip.

She had never traveled by plane. Had never been abroad. Had never been to New York. Yet within twenty-four hours after she was told to prepare for the trip, she was winging her way to New York accompanied by her guardian, Mrs. Wright, in a fast plane. She had her first glimpse of the big city, and it was hardly more than that for they had to take a taxi to the dock at breakneck speed in order to catch the steamer. Once in England, she relaxed and enjoyed her work as if she were on a vacation. She worked five months on the picture.

"And such a grand five months," she breathed. "There is no hurry over there. The restfulness and beauty of the whole countryside won me instantly. I would like to live in England some day. I did not have any night work, so we spent our evenings and Sundays doing the things I had always planned to do.

"Honestly, I would never have come back if they hadn't sent for me," she laughed. "Suddenly, they cabled for me to come home to do 'Farmer in the Dell,' and the mad rush was on again.

"The trip back was grand. We ran into a heavy storm. My grandfather used to tell me about the beauty of storms at sea and when I saw it myself, I knew what he meant. I felt let-down, when we were getting ready to go ashore, as if I had reached the end of a grand experience. Mrs. Wright and I were fussing around with our baggage. Then, I looked up and saw the man I knew I was going to love.

I KNEW it the first minute I looked at him. I had always hoped that love would come to me like a miracle. And it did. I saw George. I didn't know who he was, but I waited around pretending to be looking after my bags, hoping that some mutual friend would happen along and introduce us. I had never wanted to meet a man, as I wanted to meet him. I knew that he felt the same way, because our eyes had met for the briefest instant.

"But nobody came. And after all, a girl can't go up to a young man, and introduce herself. So I went over to the steward to speak about my trunks. Then, when I went back to join Mrs. Wright, the miracle had already happened. George was standing there, laughing and talking with her.

"Truly, if I live to be a hundred, I will never be so glad and happy as I was at that moment. Mrs. Wright didn't know what had happened to me and she said casually, 'Jean, this is George, whom Aunt Kitty is always telling us about.' It was as simple as that. I have known George's Aunt Kitty for several years and she has often told me about his career and his little escapades. I never listened very carefully. Certainly, I never dreamed that he would turn into Mr. Right before my eyes. Yet, that is how it was.

"We rode uptown together and that ride was a revelation to both of us. We found that we understood each other. We thought alike in everything.

"George knows a great deal about the theatre. He has been the moving force behind a little group of players in New York, known as the Washington Square Theatre Players. They produce plays after the manner of The Theatre Guild. George is a good newspaperman, too. He was the assistant editor of the Great Neck News, his hometown paper.

"We spent five hours together the day we met, for I had to hurry back to Hollywood. Yet, we understood each other entirely and knew, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that we were meant for each other. When we said goodbye, it was with the understanding that when we met again, it would be to marry."

So much has been said and written about her school-girl romance with Pancho Lucas. Another girl would refuse to mention it, now that real love has come to her. It is characteristic of Jean not to discount the value of this early emotion.

"I love George more than I have ever dreamed possible," she told me with sweet sincerity, "but I am not the one to deny that earlier affection of mine. It was sweet and true. I can see where it was a step in my development."

Born in poverty and nurtured on unhappiness, Jean has maintained a deep, spiritual understanding and belief that is broader than church or creed. She calls it humanness and perhaps she is right. But whatever name it is given, Jean has something that many people live their entire lifetime without finding. It is a necessary something for lasting success, too. It is this quality that has made her sure of herself and her destiny, yet has kept her humble.

THERE is a man in Hollywood who has guided Jean since she came to pictures. Little is said or written about him for he shuns publicity. At the end of a long career in which he has guided the destinies of many celebrities, he is content to live quietly each day. He is Samuel Karper, dramatic coach, and he will soon be eighty years old. Yet, of all her friends, Jean respects and heeds Samuel Karper's advice in everything. She reads the books he advises, pursues her studies along the outlines he gives her. Of all those who were close to her, it was to Samuel Karper that she confided the secret of her sudden and beautiful romance with George. When they slipped away to be married, they carried with them Karper's blessing and good wishes. And it is to his house that George and Jean like to go when they have time left for calling.

In order to help Jean with her career, George has given up his own as a newspaperman. His writing experience and knowledge of the theatre are helping him to build a new one for himself in the scenario department of a major Hollywood studio. He chose a lot where Jean is little known, so there would be no conflict between their careers.

They are making their beginning together as Mr. and Mrs. in a doll-like furnished bungalow in Westwood. The sun streams in through chintz-curtained windows. George has his desk and easy-chair in the living-room. The green and ivory kitchen is exactly right, with crispy curtains at the windows and a bright flower box outside. Jean has a real talent for home-making.

Jean didn't want a career as an actress in the beginning. However, after signing her contract, she threw all her energy into doing her job well. She has never refused anything she has been asked to do. She has tireless and unbounded enthusiasm for everything she undertakes. She is utterly fearless, too. She proved this when she accepted the role of Tony in "Sequoia."

In this picture of forest life, she was called upon to do things which even seasoned animal trainers would not undertake. Yet, she never flinched from her tasks, even though she was reminded repeatedly that she was facing death and disfigurement every time she entered the barred set where she worked. For her scenes with the deer and the puma, the studio had men stationed outside the enclosure with rifles drawn ready to protect her if anything went wrong. Yet, they knew and Jean knew that if anything did go wrong, protection would be too late to do very much good. One quick thrust and she would be disfigured for life, if not fatally injured.

She had only one rule to guide her. The trainer told her not to flinch if the puma grabbed her with its claws or teeth as this would invite an attack. So, when it did grab her, as the small scars still attest, Jean did not give any evidence of fear.

People were amazed who watched her work. Yet, they needn't have been, for she had something behind her fortitude. She had Faith. She knew that she would be able to do what was required of her, and fear had no place in her scheme of things. It has none, now.

his own surprise, he didn't succumb to their lures. To this day he wonders if it was sound judgment or just Irish luck that prevented him from falling into their eager hands.

"Had I gone to Hollywood at graduation, I would have at best been a flash in the pan. I don't know how I subconciously realized this, but a sincerity and firmness of purpose must have guided me. It surely wasn't experience or wisdom. Besides, the theatre was my first goal.

"You know, I guess it was part of my early ambition in Joplin that inspired me to come to New York and carve a career for myself. In small towns your life is so restricted that, if there's any originality in you at all, you have a strong desire to shake off the shackles. There," grinned Beal, "I guess that was turning a neat phrase."

However, landing on the New York stage did not by any means solve John's problem insofar as rejecting movie offers was concerned. For, no sooner was the last act curtain down than up came more picture bids.

"But I didn't weaken," declared John triumphantly. "I not only said 'no' definitely, but practically forgot that there was even anything as wavering as a 'perhaps' in my vocabulary. However, persistence eventually did wear me down, for I finally agreed to make one movie.

WHEN 'Another Language' was finished they wanted me to stay for another. They really wanted me to sign for several and that is when I realized the importance of taking a stand and sticking to it. Now, more than ever, I realize the necessity for keeping a clear perspective and this can only be done by occasionally getting away from the thing you are doing, so that you can look back on it without prejudice."

But the law has finally caught up with John Beal. He is going to make another movie and as soon as that is finished, he will begin his next. In fact, there will be six in a row. He owes that many to his lenient studio.

Perhaps it was Mrs. Beal, as smart as she is pretty, who suggested that John re-

YOU can't help feeling sorry for her —the girl who seems to be "in wrong" with everyone.

She's pretty — but men avoid her. She's good company—but girls let her alone. She's simply out of things. And why?

Well, bluntly, because underarm perspiration odor makes her unpleasant to be near.

And the pity of it is, she has nobody to blame but herself. For it's so easy, these days, to keep the underarms fresh, free from odor all day long. With Mum!

It takes just half a minute to use Mum. And you can use it any time— before dressing or afterwards. Mum is harmless to clothing, you know.

It's soothing to the skin, too. You can use it right after shaving the underarms.

turn to Hollywood before story ideas were settled—so that he could start fighting if necessary. How Mrs. Beal figures that occasionally movie casting is synonymous with battling—well, we've already said Mrs. Beal is smart.

But John inevitably prefers to stick around New York until the last moment; in fact, until the studio heads actually demand his return. In remaining, he not only enjoys a little more time with his wife, who is herself a stage actress, but they occasionally can have fun "putting it on" together. Putting it on, John explains, is getting dressed up and going places.

"And whenever Helen is dolled up, everybody gives a look. She's so lovely. She's a swell actress, too. She understudied the leading woman in 'Russet Mantle' last winter and when the girl was out ill, Helen stepped in and gave a slick, polished performance. I know, because I had the lead opposite her. It was the greatest thrill I've ever experienced—our playing together. We had dreamed of the time when it would happen, but never dared hope it would be so soon."

John Beal would like to be able to last ten years as an actor, but admits that if he shouldn't, he could make a nice living and be quite content as an illustrator. His hobby is sketching. In fact, he claims that that is how he wreaks his vengeance on too inquisitive interviewers. After leaving the most prying of them, he runs home, finds a pencil and puts down his impression of his recent tormentor.

Oh, let us not forget Mr. Beal's singing lessons! Yep, one a day at assorted hours. He hopes to graduate soon to regular appointments. Now you know that his vocations are acting, sketching and singing and his ambition is to excel in each. It is his contention that anyone who can succeed in one of the arts can master all the others.

Here is an actor who has a unique point of view regarding the cutting-room floor, that famous cemetery in which are buried a player's "best" performances. Beal claims that the ultimate outcome of a characterization is entirely up to the player himself, which is contrary to many an actor's usual alibi that the cutter, editor or director so mangled his fine portrayal as to make it totally useless when it finally appeared on the screen.

"I BELIEVE," says John, "that if the individual performer puts enough into his portrayal, no matter how the picture is cut, there will remain enough to form a favorable impression on the movie-goer and, incidentally, it is the fan and not the professional critic who decides the length of a player's movie life. The people who pay their dimes and quarters have to believe the characters they see on the screen and can quickly spot any phoniness. True, they may not stop to analyze 'what's wrong with this picture,' but they unerringly know that it falls short somewhere along the line and they resent it."

Beal believes that there are as fine actors in the movies as there ever have been on the stage. Gary Cooper, for instance, is stepping along to the very top. James Stewart and Henry Fonda, John predicts, will go on for ten or more years, as will Robert Taylor. Incidentally, John wishes that he were getting as much money as Taylor is reputed to make. Perhaps, Taylor does, too.

You've been seeing Beal in "M'Liss" with Anne Shirley. He plays the rural lad you have come to know and love. Although this is not the type role he prefers, he plays it to the hilt. He wants to graduate from the juvenile to straight leads and character roles and hopes some day to do the sort of parts Leslie Howard has come through the years to create in so distinguished a manner.

So—it looks as if John Beal would like to live long enough professionally to play "Romeo."

Her Guiding Stars

quickest way to make money, which I needed, and that I could earn more in pictures than on the stage. I persuaded my uncle to take me with him to London on a holiday. When he had to return to India, I hadn't been able to make any progress so I persuaded him to leave me there. He gave me enough money to last a month and my return ticket home."

THE rest is history—how she cashed her ticket when her money ran out because she was determined to succeed. It took courage. She had never been alone before in her life and she found trying to get extra work in pictures quite different from the sheltered life of an English army officer's daughter in India.

In her chart, the aspect of Venus, which brings gifts from unexpected sources, and Neptune, which rules the motion picture business, to the Sign of Cancer, under which come cafes, dining-rooms and eating places, clearly indicates that she would contact someone in such a place who would take an unusual interest in her beauty and ability as an actress. And so it happened. One day when she had a day's work as an extra, Alexander Korda and his wife saw her in the studio dining-room. At Mrs. Korda's insistence, her husband arranged to meet her, gave her a screen test and signed her to a personal contract. Her never-to-be-forgotten scene as the beautiful Anne Boleyn in "The Private Life of Henry VIII" followed, and her career was launched.

"Everyone wants to be a success," Merle said. "If I'm to be in this business or any business, I want to be as good as I possibly can."

Merle is one star who would go without work and stint herself as to finances rather than make a picture she thought unworthy. She must approve the story before she can do her best work; and she has excellent judgment. No matter what her work is she does it in the best possible manner. She tries to make the most of herself and has done an excellent job so far.

The Moon and Venus symbolize the emotions but the ascendant (hour of birth) must also be considered. In Merle's chart the Moon and Venus show powerful emotions—subservient to her mind, however. In an argument she will win without losing her temper, her dignity or your respect.

The position of the Sun and Moon shows that she will sympathize with and understand people of all classes but will find comparatively few from whom she will receive any great inspiration.

Men will treat her with respect, consideration and kindness and bring her happiness either through financial success, or the gratification of her ambitions and personal desires. The opposite sex will not only play an important part in her life's destiny, but she will also be fortunate to them, providing there is a dramatic or a love interest involved.

IN addition to an harmonious planet in the position of the heavens ruling public affairs and partnerships (matrimonial or otherwise), there is one of an inharmonious nature also, warning her to be careful of partnerships unless they are thoroughly investigated before consummation. A man who has been previously unhappily married and divorced would not be altogether fortunate for her if she were considering a romance seriously enough to marry him.

Due to the aspects of Uranus to that portion of the heavens ruling friendships, hopes and wishes, many interesting and pleasant surprises will come through friends and social affairs. The position of this planet, which has much to do with our hunches, denotes that at least 90 per cent of her first intuitions will be proven to be correct.

Every thirty-seven years the Planet Saturn comes into opposition to the Planet Neptune, which rules the motion picture industry. This opposition started on March 20th, this year, which explains why things have been upset in many studios, why pictures have been postponed, why stars have passed away and why, generally, a lot of trouble has been brewing in the industry. Saturn is sometimes an unruly old Planet, acting as a depressive, a retarder. And so, unless both those planets are well aspected in your chart this year, this may account for those sleepless nights.

Miss Oberon is one of the fortunate ones, for there are no adverse aspects to Saturn, Neptune, Venus or Mars in her chart during 1936 and 1937.

However, the early fall of this year is not particularly fortunate for a long trip or for investments. Her vitality may not be quite up to normal. She should take the utmost caution in driving. There is no serious accident indicated during this period but there may be a good scare due to an accident involving minor injuries to someone else which could have been serious. Again she is fortunate, due to the good aspects in her chart.

But in an 80 per cent good chart, there's that other 20 per cent to be considered, and at the time of Merle's birth, Saturn was in that portion of the heavens ruling the father and the home, denoting that her early environment was not all that could have been desired and that her father would not have the care of his daughter. It also shows she might never see her father, due to his death either before or shortly after her birth.

"Isn't that amazing?" Miss Oberon exclaimed in a whisper. "My father died a few months before I was born."

SATURN was up to mischief and caused her early life to be very mixed up. "It was just hash," Mrs. Smith declared, "but very well-seasoned hash because you seasoned it to suit yourself. You have the knack of doing the right thing at the right time. Even when you do what is apparently the wrong thing, it will often turn out advantageously."

The way Neptune is aspected makes her very psychic, especially when she is quiet. By relaxing quietly she can always get the answer to any problem that worries her.

"That's what my friends say," Miss Oberon agreed. "One time in England I asked Douglas Fairbanks what I should do about a picture and he said there was no use telling me because he knew that I had made up my mind what I was going to do."

The Planet Neptune indicates there were worries over money matters during her early life. (Miss Oberon was nodding her head vigorously.) But the aspects from the Moon to Jupiter, as well as from the Moon to Mercury, show that she would eventually take trips and voyages and contact those who would see in her the true artist and born actress she really is.

The Planet Jupiter, by its position in her chart, denotes discernment and judgment, not only to recognize opportunities, but the ability to take advantage of them. She is ever on the alert. What might be overlooked by many as of no consequence, she may find of momentous import. If someone throws away a stone she will make it her cornerstone. Opposition only spurs her on.

At this point a telephone message brought the information that David Niven's birthday is March first and so the question of her marriage came up again. Merle seemed as anxious to have it answered as does everyone else, particularly David. Everyone knows that he has been her favorite escort for more than a year, that she helped to get him a motion picture contract and has done everything to further his career.

"He is a Pices person," Merle volunteered. "Will we get along well together?"

YOU do get along well together," Mrs. Smith laughed. "Pices people are strongly influenced by the Planet Neptune and they quite often choose people for their mates who are born under the Sign of Aquarius," she continued.

"The hour of your birth makes you his master and the hour of his birth makes him your master. It is a fifty-fifty proposition. Your likes and dislikes are similar and you should be perfect pals. The seventh section in your chart and the seventh section in his chart (ruling partnerships and marriages) indicate that the friendship between you will result in marriage. It will be a marriage of love with no thought of ambition or gain on either side, but it would not be a good idea to marry this year. The most propitious time for it is in the spring of 1937."

"That's what I thought," Merle agreed, indicating clearly that she had made up her mind before she asked the question.

"In 1937 Miss Oberon will make the best picture she has made up to that date. This picture will convince the producers that she is an actress of unusual talent, to which the public will agree. Negotiations will be carried on and plans laid for it long before it is made. It will be made in England or it will have an English background. It will be a costume picture and have something to do with royalty."

And Merle leaned over and whispered to me that her hopes are set on making the life of Anne Boleyn or "Tudor Wench," either of which would fit this description.

"Your next picture will be a very good one, too," Mrs. Smith said. "What a chart this girl has!" she exclaimed. "If producers only knew what a find they have in Merle Oberon."

Bringing up four-year-old Mary Esther and making a screen comeback in "Hollywood Boulevard" are certainly keeping Esther Ralston busy these days.

for dashing awkwardly about making unpretty faces, she knows that candid-camera shots of her would be devastating. They are, when any cameraman can get 'em. But that's why Hepburn does all her dodging around; it's not her fear of crowds. Timidity?—twaddle! It's fear of lurking cameramen. And woe betide the studio cameraman who takes an unposed picture of Katie in an unwary moment. His job isn't worth a casting-director's promise!

ONCE in a while, she becomes motherly with her leading men. She did with John Beal. He was a naïve sort of newcomer, frightened by pictures. Katie sensed it, and took him under her wing. Throughout "The Little Minister," she nursed him along. She even astounded the company one night by coming down during night takes, when she wasn't in the scene, merely to "cue" Beal with her off-stage voice, rather than let somebody else do it. She knew Beal would respond to her own voice better than to a stranger's. Katie was all dressed up—and the workers on the RKO lot still set time by referring to "The night when Katie came to the lot dressed up!"

Other times, she'll just about worship her leading man. Like Charles Boyer. It was a common sight to see Boyer and Hepburn between shots on "Break of Hearts." Boyer sitting in a chair, talking about himself; Hepburn sitting on the floor before him, her head resting on his knee and her red hair flying wild over his legs. Her eyes would be turned to his face with a look of placid adoration on her face.

And still other times, she won't care for her leading man at all. Like in "Mary of Scotland." You see, Fredric March has star-ideas of his own. Freddie is a big shot and he knows it. Katie can't big-shot him and get away with it, at all. And so she more or less ignored Mr. March, save when the script called for them to get together.

The crews of her pictures like Katie more than the companies. She holds with the grips and the prop men and people like that; talks with them and plays with them, while she ignores her fellow players. She even drops in, unexpectedly, and visits an obscure studio worker at his side-street bungalow, just to meet his wife and kids. She's done that, several times. Yet she wouldn't turn around to acknowledge an introduction to a visiting king or queen, if she didn't feel like it.

On the set, they usually treat her with respectful awe. Most of them call her "Miss Hepburn." A few privileged ones call her "Katie." Sometimes they refer to her, but not to her face, as "La Hepburn." A negro chauffeur, attached to the company, read that designation, and calls her "Ell Ay Hepburn." But it remained for one brash, second-assistant director to top the nicknames. One day, he called her "Toots." To her face! Everybody waited for the lightning to strike and the thunder to roll and the world to be torn asunder while the brash one shrivelled in the heat of Hepburn's ire.

Hepburn stared at him, first in amaze-

OF CORRECT
FEMININE HYGIENE

For years, countless women have depended on "Lysol" as a means of antiseptic feminine hygiene... Doctors, clinics, nurses, know "Lysol" as a dependable germicide

IF YOUNG wives would only turn a deaf ear to "bridge table advice" which is usually more friendly than informed—and talk to reputable authorities, they would have the advantage of facts and knowledge...They would know that the "Lysol" method of antiseptic feminine hygiene is one recommended by many leading experts.

It is important to follow a method of feminine hygiene which you can use with confidence. "Lysol" has earned the confidence of countless women... probably no other preparation is so widely used for this purpose.

"Lysol" is a dependable germicide, used by doctors, hospitals, clinics and nurses, the world over, because of these six qualities that also make it especially valuable for feminine hygiene:—

The 6 Special Features of "Lysol"

1. NON-CAUSTIC..."Lysol" in the proper dilutions is gentle and reliable. It contains no harmful free caustic alkali.
2. EFFECTIVENESS..."Lysol" is a true germicide, active under practical conditions...in the presence of organic matter (dirt, mucus, serum, etc.) when some other preparations fail.
3. PENETRATION..."Lysol" solutions spread because of their low surface tension, and thus virtually search out germs.
4. ECONOMY..."Lysol", because it is concentrated, costs less than one cent an application in the proper solution for feminine hygiene.
5. ODOR...The cleanly odor of "Lysol" disappears very soon after use.
6. STABILITY..."Lysol" keeps full strength, no matter how long kept, or how often uncorked.

Katie Hepburn drew a picture plum in "Mary of Scotland." She plays the title role in this dramatic tale, with John Carradine as her secretary, Rizzio.

ment. Then she grinned and took it. And ever since then, he's been calling her "Toots" and getting away with it.

About her nerve, her fearlessness, there are hundreds of tellable tales. Like the time she crawled, at life's risk, across a narrow parallel some forty feet above a studio floor, just to tie up loose shoestrings that threatened to trip Director Dick Wallace and send him hurtling to injury or death. Wallace didn't know the laces were about to trip him; no one else saw it, but Katie; she couldn't warn him lest a "take" be spoiled. So she crawled out and did the obvious thing.

She won't have extras or doubles for dangerous scenes. That's old stuff, but it's true. Her friends hail that trait as a proof of Katie's sweet and soft heart—"she wouldn't ask anybody else to do anything she herself wouldn't do." Others insist it's just another phase of exhibitionism. I only know that whatever it is, Katie gets a kick out of it.

Yet, the moment you accuse her of exhibitionism, you get balled up again. She does such paradoxical, inconsistent stunts. By her own edict, her stage is closed tighter than the U. S. Treasury to visitors. Yet, one day an old, half-blind woman, related distantly to one of the bit players on her show, wanted to see the scenes being shot.

"No," said Katie. But she saw to it that, at considerable time and expense, a loud-speaker hook-up was attached to the microphone on the set, and the wires run from the stage to Katie's dressing-room. There she let the half-blind old lady sit through the day, listening to the scenes being shot, but not watching them. And every once in a while, Katie'd stroll to the mike and make an ad-lib remark over the loud-speaker to her guest. Another time, she insisted on the closed-stage rule when important visitors wanted to get on, and didn't give a hang for all the pleading of the studio executives who didn't want to offend the big shots. Yet, the same day she read a lot of off-stage lines with gestures, even though she wasn't required to—merely because a girl wanted to see her act!

Sometimes, even the studio stagehands, the technical crew, the other players on the set, get into Katie's hair, psychologically speaking. There was the temperamental moment recently when, doing a rather intimate scene with her leading man, she stopped in the midst of it.

"I want," she ordered, "everybody to turn his back and not watch!"

And so, because Hepburn's word on the stage is law, everybody save the cameraman, the director and the man on the lights, had to turn away while she emoted! The next day, a columnist wrote: "Hepburn is never really happy except when she's thinking up some new trick to prove she's really an eccentric." Katie was tough on press-agents for days after that . . . . !

Amateur psychologists, even amateur psychiatrists, have tried to figure Katie out. Professional ones haven't, because they don't get a chance or the job. Because so many half-baked analyzers have worked on Katie, knowing half the facts, all sorts of weird tales have been written. And that's where the fiction of her overpowering shyness began.

I rather imagine that there's no complex at all, in the picture. I don't think Katie's ridden by fear; on the contrary, instead of having fear for people and crowds, I believe she's got a colossal contempt for them. I don't think she's shy or timid, because no shy or timid person could do the things she does and get a kick out of them.

Maybe she is putting on an act. I do know, in support of that view, that Katie said, "They want their stars to be 'different,' do they? Well, all right, I'll show them somebody who can be 'different!' I'll be myself—and three other people, too."

And I think that's just exactly what she's been doing. She's being herself—and once in a while, she lays it on thick, and adds a few touches. Being herself is natural, because she always has been. Her parents believed in self-expression, and Katie had pretty much her own way. Her dad, a doctor, was so broad-minded that he used to take Katie along on surgical cases and medical visits and even child-birth trips, because he thought she ought to know that it wasn't really the stork who brought 'em. She was never hedged about with "must" and "mustn't" when a child, and so she never learned to put on the act of conformity with convention or etiquette and things like that. She did what she wanted to, when she wanted to, and she still does.

But since she doesn't give a darn what anybody thinks about it, let's not bother to find excuses for her. She doesn't want them—so she says!

Meet the Wife!

mongers wanted to know about "this Lamont girl." Many a girl would have been glad to tell all, under these circumstances. "Of course, we are engaged. Of course, we will be married. We have been in love a long time," sort of a "hands off, he's mine" statement. But not Lily. After careful deliberation both of them agreed to say nothing on the subject, and Fred made it known to his publicity department that he would grant no interviews about Lily—or about his mother—or allow them to be interviewed. Like Fred Astaire he did not see what these personal matters had to do with his career. He made only one exception to this rule, an interview which he granted MODERN SCREEN on his "Trial Engagement."

Another thing, which was Lily's own suggestion, was that Fred go out with whom he pleased, when he pleased. But this suggestion never bore fruit. Neither of them ever went anywhere without the other. As a matter of fact, they didn't go anywhere very much. Several nights a week Fred and Lily would go out to dinner and to a movie afterward, sometimes alone, sometimes with Fred's mother. And often, on Sundays, Lillian would entertain in her own little apartment.

She is an excellent cook (born and brought up in the South) and would start early in the morning preparing her meal. No cold-cuts-and-potato-salad from the corner delicatessen either! Southern fried chicken, no less, with fresh asparagus, fresh peas, hot biscuits and honey, and a home-baked cake to top it off. Neither she nor Fred ever drink more than one cocktail, but there are always some good ones for the guests. (The few times I've seen Fred at cocktail parties, he was wandering around, drinking milk!) These guests, incidentally, were usually the Fentons, Director Mitchell Leisen, Dean and Antoinette Jagger, and Mrs. MacMurray. After dinner they usually played games—Monopoly, Up and Down the River, or Card-throwing-in-the-hat. Fred and Lily are never "lovey-dovey" in public, never demonstrative in front of other people. It's a great relief after some of the coy cooing that one sees going on in and out of Hollywood.

HOW to meet competition? It's a known fact that most girls coming to Hollywood, if they're not actresses, are overwhelmed by a terrifying sense of inferiority, of being put in the shade by Hollywood's hundreds of glamorous beauties. You will notice if you should go to the Vendome for lunch that everyone of the female stars there looks as though she had just stepped out of the beauty parlor—hair freshly coiffed, skin freshly facialed, etc. She looks that way because, nine times out of ten, that is exactly where she has stepped from. When a star lunches at the Vendome it usually means she's not working, and when she's not working it invariably means she spends the morning at a beauty parlor. Looking at all these lovely ladies and realizing that Fred would be looking at them, too, did Lily suddenly say to herself, "Gosh, I must have my hair done a different way—perhaps like Merle Oberon. I must get lipstick like Norma Shearer's, a flattering big hat like that one Virginia Bruce is wearing. Maybe I should have 'the works' down the street at Westmore's or is Ann Meredith's better for beauty treatments?" Did she decide immediately to have herself done over, Hollywood style, to meet Hollywood competition? Fortunately, she did not. Lillian Lamont just went on being herself.

Lily is one of those rare individuals who, like time and tide, is unchangeable. For years she has been parting her hair in the same middle line. For years she has been wearing the same shade of lipstick. She has never had a facial or a massage and since her skin is beautiful and fair she sees no reason why she should start now, just because it's being done. For years she has been wearing transparent pearl nail polish. She continues to do so, and goes regularly, once a week, at the same time, to the same place, for her manicure. For years her wardrobe has consisted of two tailored suits for work, two sport suits for play, two afternoon dresses for tea or cocktail time, two dinner dresses and two evening dresses. Everything simple and in the best of taste, everything worn at the proper time. She takes care of her clothes, too, and today proudly boasts two wearable outfits that she bought two years ago in New York. Being a model she naturally has a keen clothes-sense and always looks smart.

So many men fall in love with one girl only to find, a few years later, that she is quite another person. This transformation is the ruination of more engagements and marriages than most people imagine. This is one fault which Fred MacMurray will never have to find with Lillian. People have marveled that stardom has wrought no change in Fred. Lillian—his wife since that memorable Sunday night when they flew to the marrying justice in Yuma—is, to a great extent, responsible.

Should your beau become a matinee idol—and with talent scouts everywhere, anything can happen—you might remember this story and let it guide you. Fred and Lily may not be a glamorous couple—but they have a better chance at happiness than most people in this topsy-turvy town!

Here's one more question that you might ask. How can you keep from being jealous of his fame? Like Lillian, get a terrific kick out of it!

Their Roles Have Affected Their Lives

But it was weeks before I got to the place where I could feel like myself again!"

Ginger Rogers had a similar experience once, but with an entirely different kind of role. Remember her as the tempestuous, temperamental movie star in "Personal Appearance"? Spoiled, conceited, troublesome, egotistic—all the things that the real Ginger is not?

At least, all the things the real Ginger was not until she started making that picture. Then something happened. At first Ginger didn't realize it was happening. Not until her Mother, Leila, brought it to her attention in no uncertain manner.

"I can laugh about it now," Ginger said. "And so can Mother, but I guess she was pretty fed up at the time. I was beginning to act at home the same way I was acting on the set! Talking loud and tearing my hair, and raving and ranting and pouting and stomping and throwing things around!

"It was the first time anything like that had ever happened to me. Always, before, I had left my work at the studio, when I went home at night. But for some reason this role 'got' me, and made an entirely different person out of me. As a matter of fact, I have a theory why! Maybe it'll interest you. It's simply this. I believe that all women, deep down inside, would like to be temperamental—and would be, if they could get away with it—because 'scenes' substantiate our ego, make us feel important, attract attention! So we borrow or affect temperament most easily, because, subconsciously, it's a quality we want! Consciously, of course, we recognize it as stupid, vain, selfish. I'm quite sure that's why I let it get the best of me.

"And how it got the best of me! One evening it suddenly occurred to me that my agent hadn't called me for three days. I was incensed. Did he think I was some extra girl to neglect me like that? In the past I had never thought a thing about not hearing from him for three weeks, but this wasn't the past—it was during 'In Person,' after all. Mother came in at that moment, and I let her have it. I told her nobody paid any attention to me at all, anymore. I wasn't getting the consideration I deserved even in my own house. My nerves were worn to a frazzle. It was about time they realized I had feelings, and treated me accordingly. Oh, I told her a lot of things. And I punctuated my remarks with an occasional thump on the table, and once a slipper at the ceiling. When I got through, she applauded!

"Mother said, 'What scene is that, dear?'

"That cured me."

Ginger was lucky. She recovered from her "role persecution" quickly and without a scar. But compare her experience with one Jeanette MacDonald had. Jeanette once played a role which changed the entire path of her life. A role that caused her to be rumored dead. A role that forced her to Europe. A role that made her change her entire personality. It is one of the most amazing stories in the history of motion pictures.

SOME years ago a royal scandal spread throughout Europe. A famous Princess had found her Prince Consort with an-didn't get around to it. I never do get around to it. I invite you down for tea in the broad afternoon. I scream at my maid, "We want tea and cinnamon toast and home-made cookies!

"I could, at least, press a button. I don't need to refer to the cookies as 'home-made.' But I do. The door is opened, not into a conservatory where Peruvian orchids rear their poisonous heads but into a garden where stock and snapdragons nod their everyday faces. I should be telling you a fantastic tale of a broken heart and a love affair on the Côte D'Azur. You wouldn't know the difference and it would be a story. Instead, I state honestly that I would like to be dishonest, raw and ribald instead of refined.

"I can't be honest," said Rosalind then, her clear, amused voice dropping an octave, "about what is in my heart. I can be honest only about the things outside my heart.

HERE is an example of what I mean. Trifling, but trifling things are often very indicative. The other day when we met at the studio, I had on a beige suit, trimmed with leopard cuffs and collar. You mentioned, and very nice of you, that it was attractive. I should have retreated into the collar, looked leopardish and seductive and purred a noncommittal answer. But what did I do? I told you that the leopard was an old rug I'd had about the house for years, hoping that I'd have a chance to recline upon it in Elinor Glynnish abandon and do my stuff, but that I finally got tired of waiting and cut the beast up and wore him.

"I should be able to flirt. Every woman should flirt—yes, married or single. It's a gentle, social art. It's healthy. I can't flirt. I simply cannot. I always think how funny it would look. I give a man a firm grip of the hand which tells him all and promises nothing. I look him in the eye and meet him on his own ground, and not the marshy, quicksand ground of the siren, either. Besides, it seems like cheap toying with a divine fire.

"Flirting," continued Rosalind, "is First Aid to the ladies. I remember one time in New York when I went with a girl I knew to call on a famous producer. We both wanted stage roles. The girl was little, blonde and cute. She rushed over to the producer instantly we were admitted. She leapt upon his knee. She mussed his hair. She toyed with his watch. He patted her arm. They cooed. I sat in a chair, at a distance. I knew that I should stake a claim on the other knee. I couldn't. I just sat. I didn't have a word with him.

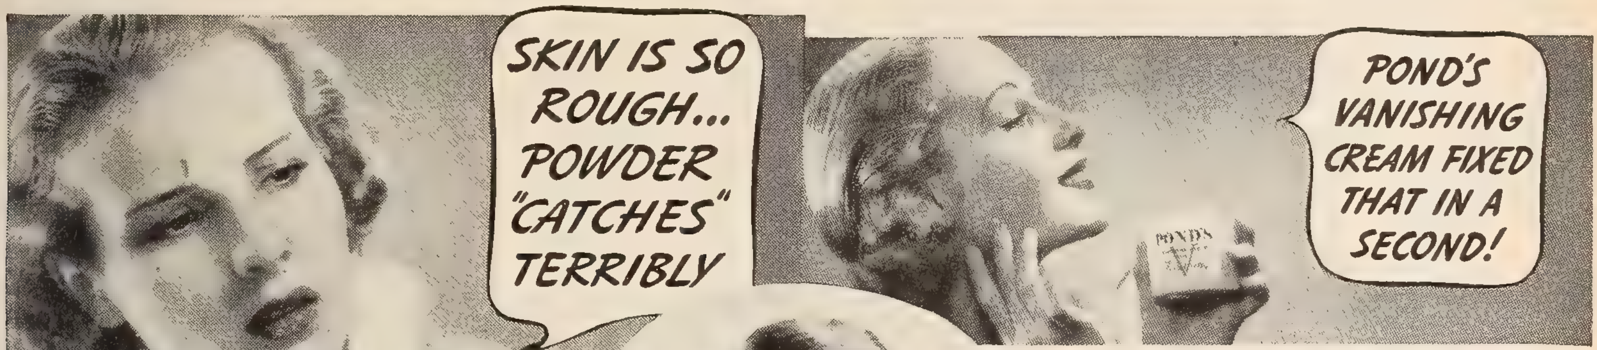
"Just the other day, for another instance, a girl friend and I were driving to the beach in my car, when two lads gave chase. They kept pursuing us. I finally bellowed to them to go away and to stay away! My friend was genuinely shocked. What harm could they do us and what's more, I could have been normally coy and feminine about it, couldn't I?

"I couldn't," said Rosalind. "I have never been able to fall in with the idea that any male pursuit of any female is either flattering or amusing. I prefer to leave that phase of life to its own dignity.

"Another time," mused Rosalind, "a good friend of Producer Dwight Wiman's gave me a letter of introduction to him. A very laudatory letter. I needed to use it, but I didn't. I felt embarrassed. I couldn't picture myself standing shyly by while Mr. Wiman read the letter. I would have had to flutter and be feminine. I carried the thing until it was too crumpled and tattered to deliver. It never was delivered.

"Probably," said Roz, with the warmth always in her voice when she speaks of home, "my home-training accounts for some of my deplorable frankness and lack of artifice. When a girl is brought up with a brace of brothers and sisters, she gets into the habit of being herself, or else. What chance had I to put on airs, to be mysterious and feline? My sisters would soon have seen through me and would jolly well have pinned me, a squirming butterfly, to the wall. My brothers would have asked me how I got that way. On the other hand, we were brought up to observe, to have respect, for each other's reticences. We shared the common family life. We kept our inner lives to ourselves. I still do.

"This reticence is bad," Roz said. "It doesn't make for 'copy.' You see, I can open my mind and pour forth the contents for what they are worth. I can't



SKIN IS SO ROUGH... POWDER "CATCHES" TERRIBLY
POND'S VANISHING CREAM FIXED THAT IN A SECOND!
POND'S

For a smooth, lasting make-up . . . First melt away roughness

ALL READY to go out . . . then you start to powder. But, somehow, your powder just won't go on smoothly. It "catches" on every tiny roughness on your skin.

Do you know, you can smooth off those roughnesses—in an instant—by simply melting them!

Those "powder catchers" are really dried-out cells on top of your skin . . . old, dead ones. As your skin keeps drying out, they flake off part way. And there they cling, loose and harsh . . .

But one application of a keratolytic cream (Vanishing Cream) melts them right away —and out comes your true, smooth skin!

A prominent dermatologist explains: "The instant a keratolytic cream (Vanishing Cream) touches dried-out cells on surface skin, these cells melt away. New cells come into view, that give the skin a smooth, fresh appearance.

"Moreover," he adds, "Vanishing Cream, regularly applied, helps to keep the skin in a constantly softened condition."

Now you know why Pond's Vanishing Cream is an instant skin softener, a marvelous powder base.

For a smooth make-up—After cleansing, put on a film of Pond's Vanishing Cream. It gives a fine-texture look, a wonderful smoothness. Powder and rouge go on evenly. No need to make up again for hours!

Overnight for lasting softness—To keep your skin softened at all times, apply Pond's Vanishing Cream every night after cleansing. It won't smear the pillowcase. As you sleep, your skin gets softer by the minute!

"I must live my own life. And I do, even in Hollywood. I have my own ways and means. Oh, no, nothing very mysterious about them. Just that when I go away—and I often do—I find places of which other people do not know. I never go to Palm Springs or Arrowhead. I follow my own trail.

WHEN it is necessary," laughed Rosalind, "I do a little Baroness Munchausening. And that reminds me, I must tell you one of the very best and loveliest lies I ever thought up. A few weeks ago a rumor got abroad that I was 'hearting'—isn't that a quaint description of keeping company with?—a certain young man, with whom I do go about quite a bit. It happened to be absurd. We are friends. Really friends. Such things can be, you know. One day on the set of 'Under Two Flags,' I was besieged with questions. Such as, was I in love with this young man and, if not, then whom? And so on. And why didn't I go places and get into columns and do things and so on and on. I finally remarked, coolly but decisively, 'But, you see, I am engaged. I am engaged to be married. I am going home in the spring for the wedding. He is a doctor. He lives in Buffalo.'

"Immediately the Press got wind of it. The grapevine system sizzled. I was called upon for details. His name, they asked, what was my bridegroom's name? Dr. Jo I told them. 'Dr. Jo what?' they wanted to know. I said, 'Just Dr. Jo.' 'Yes, but his last name,' they wailed. 'Jo,' I repeated. And then, inspirationally, 'Dr. Jo-Jo.'

"It seemed too good to drop. I told my young friend about it—the boy with whom I had been rumored as romancing. And we put our heads together and decided to go through with the story, to materialize Dr. Jo-Jo. We planned to hire an unknown actor from Central Casting. We decided that he must be stout, middle-aged, slightly bald, slightly myopic and a most unromantic looking gent. My young friend, Dr. Jo-Jo and I would then go to the Trocadero one Saturday night. I would wear very gorgeous garments. I would be dripping with orchids or, perhaps, sun flowers or something. Rather wilted, anyway.

"I would do the best acting of which I am capable. I would give every evidence of being completely, even hysterically enamored of Dr. Jo-Jo. I would gaze into his eyes. I would be oblivious to my surroundings. I would dote. I would fawn. I would ogle. My young friend, in the meantime, who knows everyone in town, would circulate and mention to all and sundry that the famous Dr. Jo-Jo was over there with Roz, that I was madly in love with him, that there was, of course, no telling about women, that we were to be married in the spring, and then off to Buffalo!

"It was a magnificent idea," laughed Roz, "I think I only abandoned it because I didn't quite have the nerve. It would have had to be done awfully well, with great sincerity and verve. But I mistrusted my ability to carry it through for more than the first ten minutes. My awful honesty would doubtless have risen up to confound me.

"I really think," said Rosalind, after we had laughed Dr. Jo-Jo back to Central Casting, "that I would be much farther on in my career if I were able to do things like that, if I could be a bit dishonest as I go along. I've never had an 'angel' in my life. I've never been able to use feminine wiles to gain my professional ends. I have a brother-in-law, for instance, who could have done me many favors, and would have done them gladly, I know. I couldn't ask him. I have, by some compulsory law of my being, to stand on my own two feet and get only what I earn. Women shouldn't stand on their own two feet. To stand on a man's feet is much more rapid transit."

Reluctantly I rose to go. Roz offered to drive me home. We went up to her lovely blue and mauve bedroom. There was a fire whispering on the hearth. Calla lillies in tall vases. Books stacked on tables. One silver-framed portrait dominated the room. It pictured a lean young face, with eager boyish eyes and a man's stern mouth.

I said "Rosalind . . . ?"

She must have known what I meant, that I had a clue, that there was a question, half answered. . . .

She said, "It happened quite awhile ago. He died, you see."

The Game's the Thing

know that I don't really want a string of race-horses or a hundred-thousand-dollar yacht. But I make myself believe I want them, because in order to be happy we've always got to have a goal in view—something which is beyond reach for the time being, but something to look forward to. When I was struggling to achieve success I thought I wanted it because success would mean comfort, security; and when I had that I thought I wanted luxury—you know, a nice house, nice cars, a swimming pool. Now I guess the only things left in a material way are race-horses and yachts."

"I guess we're never satisfied, are we?" Warner remarked. "I used to think that if I could ever make a thousand dollars a week I'd be the happiest man in the world, because what could anybody want with more than that? What could they do with it, what could they spend it on? I could have everything I wanted on a thousand dollars a week, but when I was getting a thousand a week I began visualizing five thousand. Twenty-five thousand a picture, then a hundred and twenty-five thousand. Happier? No, not if you consider only the money, but we've got to either climb or slip. The happiness comes from the knowledge that we're not slipping, but still climbing. The money is only the barometer that shows us whether we're going up or down."

Warner knows that he will never again get the same thrill, no matter how much money he makes now, that he got when he received his first thousand-dollar check. That thrill has gone forever, for although he has long since passed it, that figure was the high-water mark of his life. The thrill has gone; it is only satisfaction that remains.

You envy him? Don't bother—because, oftentimes, he's envious of you. Especially if you've got to work hard to save a little to get something you really want.

"Looking forward to getting a certain thing you desire very much but can't have just yet is the spice of life," said Warner, "and the effort of getting it is what makes life worth while. It isn't the goal, but the game that counts."

If you don't believe him, if you feel that it's easy to talk from where he is and that you'd be tickled to death to change places with him, he's ready to prove that he isn't merely trying to kid you.

"Eat to satiation of something you especially like," he says, "For instance, stuff yourself with a Christmas dinner every day. Pretty soon you'll find yourself getting sick of turkey."

DON'T think for a moment that Warner Baxter has lost any of his zest for life. He hasn't. Don't think that he doesn't want to keep on making pictures. He does. He has just signed a new contract with 20th Century-Fox for three years, four pictures a year.

He's looking forward to having six months out of every twelve for leisure, too.

"If I had all the money in the world and had to amuse myself for all twelve months every year," he said, "I'd be miserable. I've got to work to keep myself mentally and physically healthy. But I feel now that I've reached the place where I want to relax a bit as well. Why, do you know that I've never even been to Europe?"

"That's something I've been anticipating all my life," he said, "an anticipation, you might say, that I've been keeping in the hole. By means of travel I hope to bridge the most difficult transition in any actor's career; the change from romantic leading roles to character parts. To do that, in Hollywood, you've got to go away and come back again. When that time comes for me I think Europe will make it easier."

Warner's present picture, "To Mary—With Love," indicated pretty plainly that the studio at least doesn't think that Warner has to cross that bridge as yet. By the same token, "Prisoner of Shark Island" showed that he could if it were necessary. Warner himself isn't exactly worrying about it, but unlike any other actor who has ever been a Hollywood matinee idol, he views it from afar with a feeling akin to relief.

"I've been trying for quite a while to get away from the straight romantic roles," he said, "You can't imagine how I feel making love on the screen to these young girls in their teens. I look at myself in the mirror and I know it's ridiculous. Even the more mature leading ladies strike me as pretty young."

One of Warner's most marked peculiarities, the more genuine because without precedent in the movie sphere, is that he doesn't believe he's still romantic. He doesn't believe that girls all over the country are just as crazy about him as they ever were, although the box-office returns convince everyone else that they are.

His psychology is exactly the opposite from that of the baldheaded man in the front row who thinks that any chorine should be glad to give him a tumble.

"That means watching the waistline and so on," he said, "and quite frankly it'll be a relief to be through with that. As it is now Mr. Zanuck can run his eagle eye over me any morning and tell at a glance if I've gained so much as an ounce."

He feels the same way about make-up, too—it's a nuisance putting it on. Not only that, but he has an instinctive dislike for powder, rouge and all the other things the camera demands because he's essentially a man's man. Perhaps that's why the ladies love him.

WARNER has learned that it's the simple things of life that really count. In one way he was far happier when he had his dreams—dreams which since have become reality and so have lost the illusory quality that makes bubbles shine so beautifully when you blow them in the air; captured, they aren't bubbles any more.

Then he could bum around down on Main Street, going into those quaint little Mexican chili parlors, without anybody knowing him. Popular belief to the contrary, there isn't a drop of Latin blood anywhere in Warner, but he does like his chili and such. Now one of his greatest pleasures is fixing whole bucketfuls of it for his friends. He has to fix it himself now because he can no longer go down to the little parlors in Sonoratown without stopping traffic.

Summed up briefly, Warner Baxter believes that in order to be happy every human being must have:

1. The privilege of working as a means to an end. Whether it's a job to make a living or keeping house to make a husband happy, it's all the same. One must be striving toward some sort of goal, preferably an illusive goal that will take a long time to reach.

2. The capacity to enjoy the things that one has, whether they be many or few. A poor child with one doll will derive far more enjoyment out of life than a millionaire's pampered brat who is given everything in the toyshops. Adults, in the last analysis, are merely children grown up.

3. An unshakable confidence in yourself that you're ultimately going to get what you go after. Warner believes that it doesn't actually matter in the least whether you ever get them or not—it might even be better that you don't—nevertheless you must have the abiding faith that you're going to because that's the important thing. By confidence, however, he means confidence—not ego. Ego is a thing which Warner Baxter conspicuously lacks.

He had started to count the points off on his fingers, but as he got to the third one he stopped. He didn't seem to have any more points for the other two fingers.

"Why," he said, quite surprised, "that's about all, I guess. If you stop to consider those things you'll find they include all the rest, don't they?"

There seems to be no limit to Elissa Landi's talents, what with writing, singing and acting. And here she is pinch-hitting for Nino Martino's accompanist, while Nino rehearses his songs for "The Gay Desperado."

frills and folderol—let them be reduced to their simplest essentials. Use make-up, certainly, but don't count upon it to cover up a bad skin. Get a permanent or a finger wave—sure—but not until your hair is glossy with health, which means proper shampooing, plenty of massage and brushing and at least an occasional treatment from those two beauty doctors, the fresh air and the sun.

You who are overweight or lumpy, let's consider the girdle problem. You need a girdle. Any old thing won't do. A little wisp of lastex won't do. Here's where you have to spend some money. You may resent that. Well, you must learn to hold your stomach in without the aid of a properly fitted, properly boned or stiffened girdle—the kind that costs more—or you must be willing to sacrifice something to the price of a good foundation garment. One or t'other, and 'tis better, my dears, if you set your teeth and make up your minds to get a good girdle, somehow, for it will do more things for your figure than holding the tum in.

If you live in or near a large city, or town hie yourself bucketty-bucketty to the corset department of the best store and have a girdle fitted and made to your measure. Be particular as all get-out about it, too. Time spent now will be trouble saved later. Don't let the saleswoman shove you around or argue you into something you don't want. If you're marooned way out in the sticks, there's the mail service, carried on by every large store in every large city, waiting to assist you. Give your measurements accurately and describe in detail what you want.

Of course, if your figure problems aren't too knotty, you need not have a girdle made to order. But shop around and choose carefully. Remember that a good garment will wash, the garters won't be pulling off all the time, it will stay put, and the superior workmanship will render it a great deal more comfortable. Then, do—for the love of mud—wear the thing consistently. Don't park it in the bureau drawer. Don't take it off after dinner, just when you need it most.

In the meantime, here's an exercise that will do a fine amount of slimming where you probably need it most—on the hips and rear. It's a dancer's stunt. Sit on the floor. Grab your ankles firmly with your two hands and pull your feet up off the floor. You'll probably tip over sideways or backwards, and that's just the idea. Roll around on the floor, from one side to the other, in this position. Keep it up—even if you do get into some pretty funny positions. Do it for ten minutes every morning.

AT the beginning of this article, there are pictures of four very good-looking women whom you may know—Norma Shearer, Joan Crawford, Grace Moore and Jean Arthur. I picked 'em because not one of these four is an authentic beauty, and yet they all give the illusion of being so. I picked 'em because each one of these four has, in a sense, taken a dare for beauty's sake. They've worked and struggled and persevered and experimented; three of them—Norma, Joan and Grace—have had quite a fight against that old meanie, fat; Jean Arthur had to fight a tougher foe—a lack of distinction, a mousiness of personality, a "not good, not bad" appearance that got her exactly nowhere on her first try for Hollywood fame five or six years ago.

Norma Shearer is an inspiration—and a challenge—to all short people. If she had let herself go, she would be at this point, after having had two babies, a plump, roly-poly little party. Notice that she always holds herself up to her full height. She has no tum whatsoever. Try standing very straight and tall, all the time, short girls, and see how it pulls you in, in front, and lengthens your waist. Stretch your body at every point and lumps won't have a chance to settle on you anywhere. If you can't remember to stand up to every inch of your height all the time, do a stretching exercise for twenty minutes every morning—that'll make you remember!

Joan Crawford is an inspiration—and a challenge—to all big girls. Joan's a big girl herself. Look at her shoulders. And then look at her hips. Undoubtedly, you remember some of the old pictures of Joan, when she weighed one hundred and forty-five in her Charleston costume. Now she weighs—and has weighed for five or six years—around a hundred and twenty. Joan is up almost every morning at six-thirty. You get up at six-thirty and do the hip-rolling exercise I've given you and then go take a shower and have a light breakfast. Joan doesn't sit any more than she has to. On the set, between takes, she'll walk about. She never drinks. It so happens that she hates liquor.

I might mention in passing, however, that if all you imbibers, occasional or otherwise, would cut out the cocktails and stuff entirely, you'd be surprised how the slimming down process would hasten along. You big girls with big, hearty appetites—watch the meat and the starches. Eat a little meat, of course, but not nearly as much as you have been eating. You'll be surprised to notice how, if you cut down on the meat, you'll find yourself cutting down on the rest of the meal, too. You'll be surprised how little starch you need in your diet. A slice of crisp toast for breakfast. A baked potato a couple of times a week. No sandwiches, crackers, spaghetti, noodles or cereal.

Joan Crawford dotes on ice cream and once a week she has a small—a very small—portion of chocolate ice cream for dessert. If you would have the will power to make a small and occasional—a very small and a very occasional—concession to your pet appetite, I'd never complain. But how many of you would have the will power? I betcha you'd be off and eating half a pint of the stuff, huh? You want to take the bet? Fine!

GRACE MOORE is an inspiration—and a challenge—to every plump girl and woman in the world. If Miss Moore let herself go, she'd be fat all over and particularly heavy around the chin. A few years ago, as you may remember, she was anywhere from twenty to thirty pounds heavier than she is this minute. You're all familiar with the story of how she set her teeth and made up her mind she'd go back to Hollywood and win picture success. 'Tisn't so hard to understand how she slimmed down her body—again, we all know how it's done, pretty much—but time and again I've heard women wondering out loud what she did to her face. No, she did not have any operation performed. No, she didn't even go near a plastic surgeon. Why should she have? There wasn't anything the matter with her face—'twas a pretty face, but it just needed slimming down. Maybe your face is like that, huh?

Then, my dear, in addition to getting busy with a diet, which will help slim you down all over, do this: every night or morning—or both—put great quantities of cold cream under your chin and all the way down your neck to the base of your throat. Do your hands up into fists and put cold cream on them, too. Now "walk" your fists up from the base of your throat to the under-chin line and, when you get there, give it extra pressure. Go back and forth under your chin out to the jaw line. Don't press too hard as you get close to the ears. Keep that up for ten minutes a day, or more, and see if it doesn't show results. Oh, you haven't time—it's too much trouble? Well, in that case, of course . . . Oh, you say it isn't too much trouble? That's more like it!

Jean Arthur is an inspiration—and a challenge—to every girl in the world who wishes she could be "different"—who wishes she could "make herself over." With Jean Arthur, it has, largely, been a question of personality. She has, to be sure, changed the color of her hair and that has added glamor for the job she's doing. Do I think that you should change the color of your hair? Not if you're a young girl. You might give some thought to brightening rinses, however, if your hair is drab and uninteresting. Older women who find themselves going pepper-and-salt—or prematurely and unattractively grey—I see no reason why they shouldn't "do something about it." But please go to a good place, get a good operator and have a good job done.

However, with Jean Arthur, as I said, it's more a question of personality. Her looks have not changed materially, for Jean was a pretty enough girl, though lacking in distinction when she retired from the cinema field, just about licked, a few years ago. She got married and gave up all thought of continuing with her career. Her husband urged her to do some stage work in New York, confident that, with stage success behind her, Hollywood would plead for her to come back. He encouraged her to throw a dare in Hollywood's face, in a way. Well, she did, and Hollywood did and now look what's happened! And what's this to you, you ask. This: If you feel that you are making rather a muddle of things in your community, in your efforts to be a distinctive and popular individual, I advise you, instead of bucking the field—instead of laying yourself open to further snubs and slights from your associates—to retire for a spell. Go into seclusion and check up on yourself. Overhaul the figure and the face and see what can be done about clothes. Don't worry and fret and stew over things, but concentrate upon improvement. Get a job, if you can. If you already have a job, throw yourself into it more enthusiastically. Have some kind of work to do, even if it isn't a salaried job. Read all the good books you can get your hands on. Listen to the best radio programs. See the best movies and plays, too, if you can. Try to develop. Try to grow.

Then, when you feel a little more confident, give a hen party. I mean just that. Give a luncheon or a bridge or something. Don't make the slightest bid for male attention—they'll be coming to you, soon enough. The girls at your hen party will have to invite you in return, you see, and in that you'll gradually and easily get back into things.

Well, are there any helpful pointers here for you? In these articles, I want not only to advise you on improving your figures and your faces, I want to help you to be happier individuals as well. If I don't hit your particular trouble in these pages, write to me about it. My name is Mary Marshall. The address is MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y. The fee? A three-cent stamp and a return envelope. That's all.

While most gals are worrying about removing a few pounds, Gladys George, who plays the lead in "Valiant Is the Word for Carrie," had to worry about putting on ten pounds for scenes in the picture in which she was to portray an aging woman. She tried milk, and it didn't work, and she tried steaks, and they didn't work. So Paramount told her to go home and go to bed. So Gladys spent a week in bed, on salary, and returned ten pounds heavier and convinced that the movies are wonderful.

Perhaps you didn't know that seven is regarded by Joan Crawford as her lucky number. She doesn't carry her superstition so far as to insist on seven leading men in her pictures, but she likes to see the number turn up on such things as automobile license plates. In case you think Joan has no influence you ought to know that her white roadster which she drives to the studio every day bears the license: 7C7777. Nice going, eh?

Valiant may be the word for Carrie, but patience is the word for gals in love, says Toby Wing. A few years back—when she was just a girl—she cast an admiring eye at Tom Brown. Young Mr. B. returned the admiring glance, but romance was blighted when they discovered Toby was taller than Tom. Time Marched On, and they met again one night at a preview a few months ago and found Tom was now tall enough to look right over the blonde tresses of Miss Wing. Fifty years from now Toby will probably be saying, "And that, my dears, is how I met your grandfather."

More fun these evenings is watching Roland Young's mustache do tricks in "Give Me Your Heart." In a closeup scene with Kay Francis you first see Mr. Y.'s upper lip completely hidden by foliage. When Director Willie Wyler whizzes by on that motorcycle it's always worth while to get a look at what's hanging onto the rear seat. Luise Rainer has been a frequent hanger-on, and ex-wife Margaret Sullavan often goes for an airing of an evening. But the surprise came the other night when the Wyler vehicle was spotted in Beverly Hills and the dignified passenger—if one can be dignified on the rear end of a motorcycle—was Ruth Chatterton. We found out later Ruthie was doing it on a bet. Seems Mr. W. had been brave enough to go for a spin in her airplane.

Bette Davis, as we go to press, is still battling it out with the Brothers Warner. She walked out of her part in "God's Country and the Woman" after a long siege over differences of opinion regarding the Davis salary. Beverly Roberts stepped into the part and Bette stayed home sharpening the lance in preparation for a long fight. Last we saw her she and hubby Harmon Nelson were celebrating the finish of his engagement as singing-pianist at the Roosevelt.

Hot Weather Note: Production was going full blast on "Cain and Mabel," the Marion Davies-Clark Gable picture, right through the heat wave. The temperature was too much for the electricians up in the "rafters," so they manned their lights attired in shorts. Came an order from an executive commanding them to put on their trousers, that working in shorts on a Marion Davies picture was undignified. The guys put their pants on, but ten minutes later Marion herself had the order reversed. "I don't care what they take off," said Marion. "Comfort comes first."

evening after a radio broadcast, a youngster was so anxious to get his autograph that he hung onto the rear bumper of Taylor's taxi until a policeman stopped them. A broken arm in a sling didn't daunt the boy's efforts. However, he was rewarded by being taken into the cab for the balance of the trip and would even have been invited in for a sandwich except for the lateness of the hour.

HOWEVER, it was not too late for the crowd of girls who stood at the hotel entrance. With an envious glance at his hero, our free-rider remarked, "Gee, Mr. Taylor, de dames sure are crazy over you!" Which observation, doubtless is correct.

Wini Shaw, upon hearing Taylor's mob scene experience, lamented the fact that stars had so little private life. "Why, I'm doing personal appearances around New York and had to take a week off to rest up, I'm so worn out. And when I think of those still ahead, I cringe. I do so hate being pulled apart and that's what they do whenever we appear in public."

With only one night left in town, Bob Taylor checked off his last-minute jobs. As we sat enjoying the hotel's twenty-fifth floor breeze, we were startled by this young star's conscientiousness when he remarked, "I've got to spend most of this evening autographing pictures because we leave on tomorrow's plane."

"Oh, what I would give to be allowed to travel by plane again," sighed Wini. "But the studio has refused me permission. Said they couldn't afford to take a chance. And do I love flying! You know, I used to go up with the boys of the Devil Squadron out in Hollywood before I signed my new contract. But since then, I'm not even allowed to get in a plane."

Margaret Sullavan is another star who lately visited New York. Mag was combining business with pleasure. Her main object was to consult a specialist about her broken arm and, as is often the case, she stayed on for a nice vacation.

Miss Sullavan dropped in on some friends at a smart hotel for tea. Arriving during the sultry part of the afternoon, she made herself comfortable in a club chair, throwing her slim legs over the side, thus spoiling the dignified illusion created by her large picture hat.

No sooner was she settled than she confided, "You know, I think I'm slipping." And hastily explained that it was in pictures and not out of the chair that she meant. "No matter how much I might care for Henry Fonda, I could never remarry him," she rambled on, "because it would look as if I only took him back because he has become a success. Oh, well, it's just another case of where they won't let us be ourselves."

Margaret Sullavan's greatest attraction is her speaking voice. It is the most thrilling in captivity except, perhaps, Ethel Barrymore's. Ethel Colt, the latter star's lovely talented daughter, once made this observation, too.

Sipping tea at the St. Moritz's popular Sidewalk Cafe I noted Wendy Barrie surrounded by three very attentive young men. Wendy had hopped East to see about doing a Broadway play this fall. Evidently she didn't "come to terms," for it wasn't more than a week before Miss Barrie planed back to appear in "Girl of the Jungle" for Paramount.

IRENE DUNNE, one of the screen's more reticent ladies, dropped into town for a brief spell, too. She was here just prior to her trip to Europe and for a few days upon her return from the grand vacation she spent abroad.

You know, Irene accomplished quite a bit on her European trip. Leave it to Miss Dunne to mix business with pleasure. For she spent a lot of time with Eve Curie, the daughter of Madame Curie, who discovered radium. Since Irene is being starred in a story about the life of Madame Curie, it was pretty shrewd of her to get real inside information about her life and habits. No doubt the star's screen portrayal will be a knockout.

"I'm going back to the Coast and to my new home," commented Miss Dunne contentedly. "I've worked hard, but I've been singularly lucky. The story's the thing and mine have been mostly good, luckily."

One of her summer's greatest thrills was that Irene took her mother along on the European trip and her husband took them both, so that made it a family affair and, as the star avers, "It's no cinch to get my family together at one and the same time!"

stayed at the St. Moritz in New York a day before entraining for Hollywood. This time the Silent One spoke her piece. When asked what her next film would be, she remarked, "Ironically enough, 'Camille'."

Greta seemed pleased with the selection of her leading man, since the studio assigned Robert Taylor to the part before she returned. This, incidentally, is the first time she has not had the choice of who was to play opposite her. "But," remarked Garbo, "I could not have done better myself. I admire Mr. Taylor's work and will be pleased to appear with him."

Short Cuts to Sweet Success

sweet, some spicy. Assorted slices of bread are arranged on a wooden board and the guests are expected to 'toast their own.' You see," she summed up with a twinkle in her laughing Irish eyes, "I switch on my hospitality with the same ease that an Irishman turns on the blarney. In order to be able to go in for this sort of entertaining both my apartment in Hollywood and my house at the beach are well supplied with the newest gadgets and the most up-to-date equipment procurable."

This is true of most Hollywood homes, I've discovered. "And why not?" you'll argue, "they can afford it!" Which is true enough, yet I think the real reason lies deeper than that. For working around the studios must tend to make the players conscious of the fact that a great deal of time can be saved and many jobs simplified by taking complete advantage of the marvels of ingenuity turned out by inventors. You couldn't spend a day where pictures are being made—surrounded on all sides by sound cameras, microphones, Klieg lights, rain-makers, and so on without becoming mechanical-minded. What's more natural, then, than that the stars should demand efficiency in their homes?

It's a funny thing, though, that the same does not hold true nearly as often among other classes of people. For instance, a man who insists upon the last word in motor cars will profess complete satisfaction with home equipment as outmoded as the horse-and-buggy. While the city worker, who would scorn an office or factory that did not have the latest improvements made possible by modern science, travels in the evening (in an air-conditioned electric train, no doubt!) to a home in the suburbs where the kitchen has changed but little and has received but scant consideration in the family budget since Grandma's day!

You remember Grandma, of course! She's the one who claimed that she preferred elbow grease to any of these "newfangled contraptions." She baked with a coal range, toasted over an open flame, stood in a hot kitchen by the hour juggling flapjacks and banging a huge black waffle iron around.

And always cheerful about it, bless her. Well, I, for one, don't believe it. But even admitting that she might not have complained openly, still, that doesn't mean that we, today, should accept her standards as our own when modern inventions are on hand to come to our assistance.

Such things as the electric toaster, waffle iron, percolator, range and refrigerator, simplify our everyday living, while the electric-mixer substitutes for elbow grease in a most satisfactory fashion. "Cream the butter until light and fluffy" most recipes—Maureen's included—will tell you. "Beat egg whites until stiff," "Stir until thoroughly blended," "Add first mixture slowly, beating constantly." These and similar directions you have read and followed times without number. They can be done by hand, of course—given the right amount of time and effort. They can be done in half the time and with none of the effort with a modern electric-mixer.

Yes, "Time Marches On," in the home

Just twenty-four hours after Allan Jones' divorce became final, he married lovely Irene Hervey. The wedding took place in Irene's Beverly Hills home.

as well as in the studios. The silent movies of the past are the curiosities of today. And in the field of sound pictures yesterday's marvel will be relegated, tomorrow, to the nearest junk pile. And to that same junk pile should go the old-fashioned kitchen with its outmoded, work-making equipment. Cling to the high traditions of old-fashioned hospitality and old-fashioned foods, as Maureen O'Sullivan suggests, but achieve the charm they represent in a modern way.

And now there is just room enough left to remind you to send for a copy of the Maureen O'Sullivan leaflet with its recipes for Chocolate Cake, Chocolate Marshmallow Roll, Cream Puffs with their delectable custard filling, and Banana Waffles. And, of course, I haven't forgotten that I promised to give you a Waffle recipe here and now. I've also thrown in a few Sweet Toast suggestions for good measure, so that you can copy Maureen's plan at your very next party and let your guests "toast their own." For spicy or tart spreads, use any of your favorite sandwich fillings—for sweet ones, try these:

SWEET TOAST SUGGESTIONS

CINNAMON TOAST: Cream ¼ cup butter until soft. Add ¼ cup sugar combined with 1 tablespoon cinnamon. Spread on the toast the minute it is done.

CALIFORNIA TOAST: Cream ¼ cup butter until soft. Add 3 tablespoons sugar, 2 tablespoons orange juice and the grated rind of ½ orange. Blend thoroughly. Spread on toast the minute it is done.

CINNAMON-HONEY TOAST: Mix together ¼ cup strained honey and 1 teaspoon cinnamon. Spread on hot buttered toast.

WONDER WAFFLES

2 cups cake flour
4 teaspoons baking powder
½ teaspoon salt
1 tablespoon sugar
1 cup milk
½ cup cream
2 egg yolks
⅔ cup melted shortening
2 egg whites, beaten stiff

Combine flour, baking powder, salt and sugar. Sift together twice. Add milk and cream slowly, beating constantly so that there will be no lumps in the batter. Add egg yolks and the shortening which has been melted and cooled. Beat together thoroughly. Fold in stiffly beaten egg whites. Bake mixture in preheated waffle iron until crisp and brown. Delicious with honey, grape jelly, warm syrup; or topped with ice cream and a sundae sauce; or smothered under creamed chicken or creamed chipped beef.

The Small-Towner

fifty dollars a week, can live more comfortably and give his family more real security than a city man who earns twice as much. I know; I've lived in both. And that sense of security binds a family together.

HERE'S another point: a boy growing up in a small town has a much better chance than a city boy to get acquainted with his father and mother. He sees them more often. And if they're the kind who are real pals, as mine were—well, he doesn't get ideas about breaking away. I never had the feeling that Mother and Dad were trying to live my life for me, or pick my friends. I did have the feeling that they considered my interests, my ideas, my friends. They seemed to trust my instincts. There's nothing a boy appreciates more than that. Even when I came home from college with a bride—a girl they had never met—I knew they would like her. And they did."

But John had left something out of his story. How had he become a singer?

John laughed. "I was lucky, I guess. Nobody ever tried to make a singer out of me when I was a youngster. About the only vocalizing I ever did was in school, in church, or in a crowd at somebody's house. I liked it—but I had to grow up, and go off to war, and come back again, before I took singing seriously. Maybe it was just as well. I had a chance to grow up normally, and my voice had a chance to develop normally. My life wasn't warped by premature ambition, and my voice wasn't strained by premature training. For one thing, there wasn't any training to be had in Greenville. So, there's another reason for me to be glad I grew up in a small town."

He had said that he had no early intimations of a future as a singer. How about acting? Had that ever entered into his plans?

"I'm afraid the answer is 'No,'" he answered, with characteristic deliberation. "I was drafted for a few leading roles in high school plays, but I always blamed that on the fact that I was pretty good at elocution. I could put expression into lines, and I could make myself heard to the back row of the auditorium without shouting. But I never kidded myself into thinking that I was the White Hope of the American stage. I realized I didn't know the first thing about acting—so I just concentrated on being as natural as possible. And I guess I'm still concentrating."

I happen to know something about the size of his fan mail. After Shirley Temple, who is tops for all of Hollywood (she receives 5,000 letters a week), John ranks next at 20th Century-Fox as a letter-getter. And a large part of that popularity, certainly, can be traced to his naturalness. I told him that and asked him if he thought it was easier to be natural in a small town than in a city.

"Yes," he replied. "You don't have to be putting on a continual act to impress people because everybody knows you already. And if you do try to put on an act, you soon get deflated. If you can't have a good time being yourself, you can't be happy in a small town. And by that I don't mean self-satisfied, either. You can have ambition there just as well as in any city."

That being the case, what ambition did John develop in Greenville?

"I wanted to be a doctor," he answered, simply.

HE enrolled in the University of Texas at Austin, majoring in science and minoring in French. He kept up his baseball pitching, and his tosses were good enough to win him bids from the major leagues. He sang in the University glee club—which developed a state-wide reputation. But his big interest was his pre-med course. After he finished it, he was going on to Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore.

It was in the University that he met Marcelite Dobbs—from another small town, only fifty miles from Greenville. They fell in love. Together, they dreamed of John's studying medicine and becoming a doctor . . . dreamed of marriage years hence. Then, in April, 1917, a cloud appeared on their happy horizon. America entered the war. There was a chance that John might have to go. Impulsively, upon graduation, they married—and then broke the news to their parents. He was tall and physically fit; he was certain to be sent off to training camp. With this prospect before him, he enlisted, and made an application to join the Intelligence Division, on the basis of his knowledge of French. After only a few weeks of preliminary training, he was en route to France.

"I was all over France. They shifted us constantly, so that no one would get wise to our little game of checking up on spies, deserters, stolen supplies and what-not. Sometimes I was in uniform, posing as a new member of a regiment; sometimes I was in civilian clothes. I came closer to 'going West' with a knife in my back, in some dark slum where I had been sent on assignment, than I did to stopping a German shell that had my name on it, though that shell pursued me persistently for one stretch; I'd no sooner get out of a town than it would be bombarded. Once I was picked up as a spy, by a British patrol, who heard me talking German to a woman I suspected of trading in war information. I had to talk fast, and get in touch with headquarters in a hurry, to save myself from a firing squad. But, compared with the boys in the infantry, I had a holiday."

One night in Havre, in a Y. M. C. A. hut, he joined in the group, singing. An Englishman standing next to him asked if he was a professional singer. When John said, "No," the man told him that he should be—that he had a voice that could be developed. He said he knew because he was a voice teacher. John thanked him for the compliment, and forgot it—until months later.

"When I finally got my discharge, and arrived back in the States, I didn't want to remember anything except the quickest way to Greenville, Texas," John told me. "I had joined the army and seen half of the world, but I was willing to trade Greenville for all the rest. Besides, I had a pretty wife waiting there for me. Marcelite had been living part of the time with her family, and part of the time with mine.

"I sat around for a few days, after I got home, wondering what I was going to do with my life. I decided that I couldn't go on with medicine. I had forgotten too much of my pre-med course, and it would take years to finish it. And when I did finish, I'd still have to struggle for years before I could support myself—and my wife. So Dad spoke to a cotton broker friend of his, and I set out to learn the cotton business in this man's firm, in Dallas."

When did he remember the Englishman's advice?

"I told the story, as an amusing incident, to some friends in Dallas, where I was doing a little singing with a community glee club. It apparently made a bigger impression on them than it did on me, for a few months later, when Oscar Seagle came to Dallas to give a concert, they arranged an audition for me. When I heard the news, I was down with a sore throat. But the news was like a tonic; I wasn't going to let anything stop me from finding out if I had a voice or not, and I sang for him.

"Seagle told me, 'Young man, come to New York for a year, let me train your voice, and I'll guarantee that you will make something of it. The material is there.' I talked everything over with Marcelite; she was as excited as I was. Dad 'loaned' me a thousand dollars—and I set out."

Seagle found John so promising a student, and liked him so well as a person, that he made him his assistant at his summer students' camp in Glens Falls, New York—another small town that was to figure in his life. After the summer at camp, John became teacher of music in the Glens Falls high school. You can imagine how quickly the local girls became music-conscious, with an instructor of John's appearance and appeal. Anyway, John lasted out the year and the experience convinced him that he could earn a living with music. But earning a living wasn't enough. He wanted to be able to do some worth-while singing. To do it, he needed more training. To get that training, he needed to study in Europe. But how to get to Europe and live after he arrived there?

I HAD a brainstorm," John explained. "I suggested to Seagle that he sponsor a year's course in Europe for forty or fifty advanced students, and I'd take them over, and chaperon them, for my expenses. He liked the idea, we rounded up the students, and off I went to Europe—with Mrs. Boles and little Marcelite—to study under De Reszke, Seagle's own teacher. I didn't want to come back when the year was up, but I had no choice—no money.

"And it wasn't until I landed in New York that time that I had the idea of going on the stage. A friend who was working in an advertising agency egged me on. He told me I could live with him, out in Jackson Heights on Long Island, until I got a job. And he staked me for three months. It took me that long to find a job. I was offered chorus-boy jobs, and roles in road shows, but I was holding out for a lead on Broadway.

"Just when I was about ready to give up trying, luck stepped into the picture. The leading man in 'Little Jessie James' dropped out; I was given a chance in his place. Maybe you remember the show—the hit tune was 'I Love You.' It lasted for months."

From then on, the name of John Boles meant money in theatre box-offices. Gloria Swanson, then producing pictures, saw his movie possibilities, signed him to a personal contract, made him her leading man in "Loves of Sunya," which opened New York's palatial Roxy Theatre. ("There's a rumor," John interjected, with a smile, "that I was once an usher at the Roxy. That strikes me as improbable, when my first picture opened the place.") The picture was a failure, but Boles was a success. When Gloria, abandoning production, released him from his contract, Fox promptly signed him—and he has been in films ever since, except for personal appearances. He has just completed his latest, and most successful tour.

When he completed "Craig's Wife," for Columbia and signed a new contract with RKO-Radio, he decided he'd take a few weeks' vacation before starting any films under the new arrangement. He had visions of actually taking a vacation. Then came calls and wires from the East, urging him to "appear" in Boston, Detroit and Chicago. He thought he would discourage them by saying that he wouldn't "appear" for less than $8,000 a week—thinking they would never touch that figure and he could go ahead with his vacation plans. They fooled him. They met the figure.

Incidentally, he enjoyed his recent role in "A Message to Garcia" more than any he's played recently. "I liked going around with a stubble on my face for a change," he revealed. "I liked wearing dirty old clothes. I even enjoyed the mud we worked in. It was a drift in the right direction—away from straight hero roles into character parts. You know, I like to think of myself as a business man. And the more variety I can have in my roles, the better my business ought to be, the longer it ought to last. That's why I don't complain when I don't get more singing roles. People don't have a chance to get tired of me as they might, if I sang in every picture."

And now that he is a man of big business, where and how does he live? In a small town! A small town named Beverly Hills, near Los Angeles, where he and his small family have a small house and garden. A small town whose first movie settler was Jean Hersholt and whose mayor was once the late Will Rogers.

And why is he glad that he married a small-town girl? Because her acceptance of life has been the same as his—because she, too, has been content with small happiness, and simple wants, gambling to fulfill a dream.

SINCE seeing John Boles in New York, I have driven to Hollywood. In passing through Texas, I went twenty-five miles out of my way to get an impression of Greenville—situated in gently rolling farm country, very fertile farm country, to judge by the black loam everywhere. It is larger than I anticipated, with well-paved streets, a steady flow of traffic, stop-lights, an extensive business section. A clean town, alert and progressive.

I located the post office, inquired where I could find "John Boles' father." I was told that his name was John Boles, also that he was the village tax assessor, and that I could find him in his office in the next street. At the tax office, a tall, gray-haired man—a replica of the movies' John Boles, except for the gray hair and the absence of a mustache—came forward to meet me. We sat down to talk about John. And he told me these things, which John hadn't:

That when John was about three or four, the family had a colored "mammy"—and every time they went out, they would come home to find John singing some song that the "mammy" had been teaching him. That maybe John inherited his singing inclinations from his father, who used to sing before he was married and started staying home nights, and who organized a glee club in Greenville at one time. That John was the best pitcher that Greenville ever had. That John went to the two-story red-brick school across the street, parking his bicycle where rows of other bicycles now were parked. That his name is engraved on a statue of Minerva in the hall of the school. That even in high school John could talk French like a native. That his father and mother didn't discover, until John and Marcelite were married, that they had gone to school with her mother in East Texas. That they hear from Marcelite every week, and sometimes oftener. That John is trying to persuade his father to retire and go out to live with him in California. That he thought John's best pictures were those with Shirley Temple. That John thinks she helps the popularity of every adult who plays with her. That John's middle name, Love, is his mother's maiden name.

On the outskirts of Greenville, this sign arches the highway, "Welcome to Greenville—The Blackest Land, The Whitest People."

And, certainly, few people are "whiter" than John Boles, who says, "I'm glad I came from a small town!"

Place Your Money On These!

striking and effective in blue, as well as green, yellow and black. Don't you remember that stunning lacquered satin evening gown which Madeleine Carroll wore in "The Case Against Mrs. Ames"? It had a sheath-like silhouette and was a marvelous foil for her blonde beauty. As I recall it, a corsage of camellias was the only decoration.

SHEEN is one of the big and exciting developments in all varieties of fabrics. There are shiny hairs in woolen textures, much satin and glistening metal cloths. Then in direct competition to these shiny textures are the dull crepes that have the look of woolens. These woolen-like effects are achieved by both rayon and silk yarns and the fancy weaving as well as the threads give you some very unusual materials from which to choose. In coats, especially, the fabrics with gleaming hairy threads are popular. Broadcloth is coming back with a bang. And, of course, don't forget the velvets because they never fail to take their rightful place in smart dressmaking.

While on the fabric theme, our Hollywood pictures are a great help. To return to Simone Simon's dress, which incidentally, was especially designed for her by Marcel Rochas of Paris, the contrast of the dull gray wool and the shiny chenille embroidery is just what I have been talking about above. And the silhouette of this dress is new—fitted through the waist with slightly widened shoulders and a flare to the skirt. Notice the wide lapels of the collar and the nice use of the same stars for buttons that trim her wide leather belt. Simone is French, you know, and makes her American picture debut in "Girls' Dormitory."

Then there are the two tunic dresses, one a daytime version worn by Olivia de Havilland on page 65 and the other the more formal dinner type, worn by Jessie Matthews on page 66. Tunics can't be gauged by any certain length because they vary so according to the design—some are quite short and very flared, others are longer and only moderately jutting. Peplums, the briefest of all, are charming for slender young things.

Olivia's tunic costume features one of the dull surfaced crepes with satin back and is made in three-pieces. A white satin, short sleeved blouse tops a slightly flared black skirt with the high waistline accented. Over these two goes the belted tunic coat with lapels and facings in the satin. The short sleeves of the tunic are puffed to give a wider shoulder line. It's a beautiful dress and one that would fit into a dozen and one fall activities. I like Olivia's choice in accessories, too, especially the shirred black suede gloves so cleverly trimmed with metal ornaments. And don't you like the pointed and rather full tam-like turban? Incidentally, don't overlook the opportunity to win one of Olivia's "Anthony Adverse" dresses. See contest, page 74.

Jessie Matthews, that lightfooted English star who is fast becoming an American pet, wears a formal version of the tunic. This is from her own wardrobe and she calls it a "cocktail suit"—I wouldn't limit it so because it is one of those grand affairs that can start out at five-something in the afternoon and go right on through dinner, theatre and dancing. What's more, the tunic can be interchanged with a shorter skirt and appear as a rather elegant afternoon dress. Anyway, Jessie wears hers for cocktails in the more formal English sense, and the color scheme sounds like some exciting concoction. The rather slender satin skirt is a coppery brown shade—lots of copper tones in everything—and the tunic, snugly fitted and buttoned through the top, is leaf-green and copper brown metal cloth. Her high turban is of the skirt material with a strip of the metal cloth as trimming.

ONE of the nicest things about this fall's fashions is the variety of styles. From flares and jutting silhouettes, you can turn right around and pick an almost straight-line coat dress like the one Louise Latimer is wearing on page 64. This is one of those standbys that never seems to weary any of us. Louise's good looking version is made in a gray wool checked in a white yarn. It buttons from neck to hem with self-covered buttons and the collar is unusually smart in its width. Note the slanting pockets and the jeweled butterfly pin she uses for a collar ornament.

A darker shade of gray is Louise's choice in accessories and a very good one for this fall since dark shades of gray are showing up in the hat, shoes and bag lines. Her felt hat has a becoming tilt and roll to its brim, showing one complete side of her hair.

And still another good old classic with a new interpretation is Pat Paterson's green and white tweed suit. The green predominates with the white appearing only as a fleck. Pat, however, gives the white a lift by wearing a wide white collar out over the collar and lapels of the suit. The jacket is a single breasted one, closing with three buttons. Patchpockets, button trimmed, are the only decoration. Pat has her jacket shoulders padded a little. A soft black velour hat and black strap shoes complete the outfit.

You will see lots of green in dress, suit and coating fabrics. Although the first indications this fall were toward a predominance of black, now there are plenty of bright colors coming to the fore. Some of the new colors to look for when shopping are: raisin brown, spruce green and a cherry wine shade—then there is a vast range of reds from rust to a light, bright shade called nasturtium. One of the favorite rust shades is called "red earth." Purples, bright and dregs shades of wine as well as the grays mentioned earlier.

Don't overlook Jessie Matthews pert topper on page 66. It was made for her by Agnes, the famous French milliner, and is like a cap in ribbed felt with a gay, bang-like ostrich feather trimming. Feathers and ribbons are making all sorts of fall hats very festive. Shapes in hats go from these becoming little caps for more formal wear to peaked and brimmed styles for daytime. Whether you found high crowns unbecoming in past seasons or not, you will be able to wear the new hats that effect them. There's a twist to the brims and a taper to the crowns that seem to make them more generally becoming. And turbans, many giddy ones with big bows on them, are going to be the darlings of the younger set.

I COULDN'T start to cover the subject of bags, shoes and gloves, so great is the abundance of interesting designs. Just to simplify matters somewhat, I am showing you two accessory groupings on page 65. You'll be interested to know that you can have not only the prices, but also information on where to buy these in your local shops, by just writing in for my new "Shopping Bulletin," which I shall tell you more about shortly.

The first accessory group includes a pump, belt and bag to match. The pump is brown suede with the new higher cut accented by a tongue-like detail in patent leather and suede. You will find that all the latest shoe designs stress this higher instep line; many in fact, try to give a boot-like effect. The heel of this pump is patent leather to match the trim—combinations of two leathers are very good. Only the top of the bag appears at the edge of the picture—that is to show the metal trimming which ties up with the detail of the belt. These three make a very stunning trio for any daytime fall costume.

In the second group you find a high-strapped shoe in suede and kid with bag to match. These shoes also stress the higher cut, using a wide strap that buttons on the side. The adroit use of the kid trimming gives an unusually graceful foot line. The large matching suede bag is without ornamentation but has a tubular handle held by large rings at either end. Green suede pull-ons with contrasting lacing down a panel on the back of the hand, make a sharp and effective contrast note with the smoky gray shade of shoes and bag. By the way, this particular dark shade of gray is a wonderful team-mate for black as well as the brighter fall colors.

conceited, but I'd bet he's so conceited that Hollywood can hardly hold him and it would take more than the article I read to prove he isn't. Why, he even looks as if he is saying, "Well, I'm the best looking thing anywhere, I'm Prince Charming, himself." Nuts!

All of my girl friends are wild about him, but I'm certainly not. I'd have to see him in person to find out what he's really like before I'll ever admire him.—Anne Preston, Crescent City, Fla.

Still More About Mr. Taylor

Gable used to be tops on my list but he is only second now. That Taylor boy took his place. I am not going to make this a love letter, as I imagine he gets enough of them. Lots of luck to him. J. Morse, Battle Creek, Mich. How about having Bob Taylor and Loretta Young in a new version of "Seventh Heaven"?—N. Cherkoff, Kiamesha Lake, N. Y. In "Small Town Girl" when Bob appeared in his roadster, a murmur of oh's and ah's could be heard throughout the audience. In "Private Number" just before he appeared on the screen for the first time, the people began to applaud. Now if that isn't popularity, I don't know what is.—M. Kustra, Chicopee, Mass. Bob Taylor is a nice chap and all that but I can't lose the feeling that he is always trying so hard to impress on everyone's mind that they must notice that perfectly bee-oo-tiful profile of his. I admit it is one he can be proud of, but I'm sure we'd all love him much more if he'd be just slightly less, shall we say, aggressive with his nose.—I. Pearsall, Seattle, Wash. I believe that Bob Taylor will lose his position as female heartbreaker if his publicity doesn't change. One interview which I objected to most strenuously was the one in which he told about the girl he can't forget. How does he expect to keep his gal fans interested? Even if self-possessed Bobbie did lose out, he shouldn't go around talking about it. His publicity manager certainly needs a few pointers.—L. Losen, San Francisco, Calif.

Reviews

March, 1932, that Jane first stormed Hollywood. With her mother and countless letters from folks back in Atlanta, who recommended her talents, she started the rounds of the studios. It was two years before Jane got that break in "Bright Eyes." In the meantime the youngster did radio skits and an occasional "extra" role in the celluloiders. . . . Those tomatoes strewn around with such a lavish hand were all "doctored." Each one was punctured and a panchromatic make-up liquid of deep red inserted in order that each would register realistically on the screen as it struck the victim.

★★★ Mary of Scotland

(RKO-Radio)

The writing-directing team of Dudley Nichols and John Ford, responsible for last year's finest picture, "The Informer," combines forces again and emerges with a first-rate though slightly routine screen drama. "Mary of Scotland" is lavish in every detail, long, sometimes slow, but often interesting. As Mary Stuart, Queen of the Scots, Katharine Hepburn's performance will more than satisfy her followers, although it must be noted that at times one feels that Queen Mary and "Alice Adams" are sisters under the greasepaint. Finest portrayal is that of Fredric March, who lends fire and charm to the lusty "Earl of Bothwell" role. The March family can almost be said to walk off with the picture's acting honors, for the Queen Elizabeth of Florence Eldridge (Mrs. March) is a sharply defined performance that makes hers one of the outstanding roles in the production. Other commendable portrayals are Douglas Walton's Lord Darnley, Moroni Olsen's John Knox, Ian Keith's Earl of Moray and John Carradine's Rizzio.

Playing the deadly enemy roles of Queen Elizabeth and the Earl of Bothwell were one of Hollywood's most devoted couples, Fredric March and Florence Eldridge. Somewhat upsetting their domestic tranquillity, however, was the schedule which made it impossible for them to work on the same day at the studio. Now they're on a trip to the Canadian woods with Penelope and Anthony to renew acquaintance. . . . Fredric's ambition has been to stay clear of costume roles, and with that in mind refused a contract with any studio. But the first role he accepted on the new free-lancing program was in this flicker so he's decided sartorial elegence must be in his blood after all. . . . Mrs. March had her costume troubles, too. Weighing a bare hundred pounds she was given a costume weighing 52 pounds, what with brocade, petticoats, embroidery and jewels. The solution was a baby-walker on wheels which the voluminous folds of her skirt disguised on the screen. . . . Many of the sets had to be strongly reinforced to support the unusual weight of the settings. On one scene alone 32,500 feet of flagstones, weighing 325 tons, was used. As if this were not enough, 200,000 pounds of soil was added. . . . James I was really twins in the picture. A state law forbids infants being photographed more than a minute at a time, so twins are selected whenever possible to prevent unnecessary delays in production.

'HOUSECLEAN' YOUR SKIN

A Penetrating Face Cream Is What You Need!

By Lady Esther

When it comes to your skin, be a good housekeeper! Don't be satisfied merely with surface cleansing. Get "into the corners."

You may not realize it, but many complexion woes are due to nothing else than imbedded dirt. This dirt may not be noticeable at first because it is buried quite deep in your skin. But it causes tiny bumps and rough patches which you can feel with your fingers.

Make the finger-tip test described to the right, and if you feel anything like tiny bumps or dry patches, you can be sure your pores are clogged and your skin dirty. This hidden, stubborn dirt, as it keeps on accumulating in the pores, causes, not only gray-looking skin, but enlarged pores, blackheads, dry patches and other unsightly blemishes.

Feel Those Little Bumps?

Pass your fingers over your whole face. Do you feel little bumps in your skin? Do you feel dry patches here and there? Little bumps or dry or scaly patches in your skin are a sign your pores are clogged and your skin needs "housecleaning."

Meets the Need!

Lady Esther Face Cream adequately meets the situation because it is a penetrating face cream. Gently and soothingly, it penetrates your pores and there it "goes to work" on the waxy matter. It loosens it—breaks it up—and makes it easily removable.

When you have cleansed your skin with Lady Esther Face Cream, it shows it, both in the clearness and radiance of your skin and in the tingling sensation of freshness.

Lubricates Also!

As Lady Esther Face Cream cleanses your skin, it also lubricates it—resupplies it with a fine oil that overcomes dryness and keeps the skin soft and smooth.

Lady Esther Face Cream is on sale at all drug and department stores, but for a free demonstration, mail me your name and address. I will at once send you a 7-days' tube postpaid and free. See for yourself how this cream works.

See how deeply it gets into the pores, how thoroughly it cleanses your skin. Your cloth will reveal dirt that you never suspected lurked in your skin.

See also how soft and smooth and supple Lady Esther Face Cream leaves your skin. The results will literally amaze you. You will understand then why eight million women say that all their skins need is this one face cream.

Prove to Yourself!

With the free 7-days' tube of Lady Esther Face Cream, I will also send you all five shades of my Lady Esther Face Powder so you can see which is your most flattering shade and how Lady Esther Face Cream and Face Powder work together to give you perfect skin smoothness. Write me today.

Mlle. Simone Simon in a scene from "Girls' Dormitory" with Herbert Marshall.

star about whom so much has been written. It is a pleasure to report that Mlle. Simon lives up to all expectations—she's an actress, she's attractive and she has a certain child-like quality which even her studio publicity department has difficulty describing. In fewer words, her debut is an auspicious one. And the picture itself, patterned somewhat after "Maedchen in Uniform," is for the most part excellent in spite of several obvious Hollywood touches. For one thing, the picture's producers have chosen to equip their school with a class of girls, each one of whom must have won beauty contests. However, this is perhaps a minor complaint. A major grievance is that a fine picture is weakened by a phoney ending.

Very briefly, the story goes like this: Anna Mathe (Ruth Chatterton), an instructor at a girls' school, has long been in love with the school's director (Herbert Marshall). Marie Claudel (Simone Simon) has a schoolgirl infatuation for the director. When one of her love letters is found she is brought before the school board, but escapes expulsion through the efforts of Anna, who understands the situation. Marie goes on to Paris after graduation, and the director follows her. In Paris we find Mlle. Simon's natural charm distorted by a make-up which makes her look like every other blonde in Hollywood, and this, together with the compromising climax, mars a potentially excellent picture.

Preview Postscript

Simone Simon, 20th Century-Fox's White Hope, has had a time of it since the studio imported her from France about a year ago. Mlle. Simon came to Hollywood with a great blast of publicity, but a decided lull followed due to the studio's discovery that she brought along too much French accent and curves. Scheduled for "Under Two Flags" she was replaced at the last minute by a fellow countryman, Claudette Colbert, but was appeased by promise of co-starring with Herbert Marshall and Ruth Chatterton in this flicker. Mr. Marshall and Miss Chatterton proved again what fine troupers they are by doing everything possible to make their 20-year-old co-star feel at home on the set. Miss Chatterton had other things on her mind, too. Primarily the defiance of her physician who ordered her to bed the second day of production with dire threats of approaching pneumonia. Ruth stayed two days, then appeared at the studio with her nurse and stuck it out for the picture's duration. . . . Since playing Papa Dionne, John Qualen's acting career has been on the skids. He was just too good. Now a movie audience glimpses him in any scene and howls with glee. Discouraged at first, John has finally solved his difficulties by perfecting a make-up which is as unlike himself as possible.

★★★ Give Me Your Heart
(Warners)

Here is a good picture with an excellent cast to do it justice. Kay Francis' role of Belinda Warren, who loved not wisely but too well, provides her the best acting opportunity she's had in many a movie moon. The honors, however, must be accorded Roland Young with his characterization of "Tubbs." When Mr. Young gets his wits to work on a role worthy of him, you can be assured of the best comedy in town. As the distraught husband of the lovely Kay, George Brent has a rather thankless job but makes a sincere effort to do well by it. Henry Stephenson gives his usual polished performance, this time as Lord Farrington whose diplomacy saves the day for his son, Patric Knowles, and his daughter-in-law, Frieda Inescourt. Patric Knowles is adequate, but Miss Inescourt will surprise you with a display of talents heretofore unsuspected.

Preview Postscript

"Sweet Aloes" was the name of this play until the studio decided to inject more heart interest into it. Roland Young played the same role in the London production, with Diana Wynyard in the Kay Francis role. Being one of the favorite characters of all those Mr. Young has portrayed on the stage throughout the years, it was a simple matter to get him lined up for the movie. It's a far from simple matter to get the restless Roland signed up to most contracts. He's too busy to bother, what with writing, sketching and traveling always uppermost in his mind. Mr. Young's contribution to the studios, besides his acting, is a collection of the most unique biographies on record. Each studio where an actor works requests a long, detailed and flowery biography of the player. Mr. Y. has worked for all of them, and prides himself on leaving behind an entirely original and exclusive history of himself with each publicity department—and not a word of truth in any of them. . . . Pat Knowles has a publishing background—Knowles, Sr., being an Oxford publisher, who had high hope that Pat would follow in his footsteps. But after his son had sat around reading all the plays in the house for two years, father decided someone else could pay him a salary. London stage managers did so for awhile, then some New York ones did and now the movie moguls are footing the bill. . . . Kay Francis spent all her spare time on the set knitting green sweaters and fitting them on a stalwart electrician. Delmer Daves, according to our spies, has the same chest expansion!

★★ Suzy (M-G-M)

If "Suzy" does nothing else it proves that Jean Harlow is being wasted in roles for which neither she nor the audience can have much relish. One of the screen's finest comediennes, when she's given the opportunity, Miss H. finds herself unhappily cast as a tragic young wife whose waking moments are spent moping about the house wondering about the whereabouts of her husband. Not particularly because Jean Harlow is not the kind of gal you'd leave at home, but because this type of role doesn't fit her. "Suzy" is going to be a disappointment to her followers. The story itself is a lugubrious wartime affair having to do with an American chorus girl, an Irish mechanic and a French aviator. The mechanic (Franchot Tone) befriends the chorus girl and she marries him, only to leave him on their wedding night when he is supposedly murdered by a German spy. The gal becomes the bride of the aviator (Cary Grant), who immediately leaves her for any girl who happens to be handy. Then Mr. Tone makes an appearance, all of which complicates matters considerably. Long and slowly paced, "Suzy" is an unfortunate vehicle for its star. Of the principals, Franchot Tone steals the acting honors.

Those who were lucky enough to go on location with this company up at Carpenteria claimed they had never had such good food before. And the cook was none other than Jean Harlow! Jean assumed full charge of the traveling kitchen for three days. It all started when she was rash enough to bring a picnic lunch the first day for the cast. On her admission that everything, including fried chicken, chocolate cake and such, had been prepared by herself, the cast ushered her without further to-do toward the kitchen. . . . That airplane crack-up scene was the genuine thing and provided almost as much excitement as the new cook. Frank Clark makes his living crashing planes for movies, fairs and exhibits. It's all in the day's work, Frank says, and he never has a qualm about his selection of a life work. . . . Stanley Morner makes his second appearance here. Stanley is the protégé of no less a personage than Mary Garden, who discovered him in a Chicago night club and insisted that he turn actor without further delay. Miss Garden was a frequent visitor on the set while Stanley was before the cameras and seemed pleased with the progress of her "find." M-G-M has just appointed the diva as operatic advisor for the studio. . . .

★★★ The Devil Doll (M-G-M)

This picture is so decidedly different from the usual run that you are likely to regard it either as very good, or lacking entirely in entertainment qualities. The plot is so engrossing that the love interest becomes a negligible factor. Lionel Barrymore has an excellent opportunity to display his versatility in the leading role. An escaped convict, he has one idea in his mind—revenge on the men who ruined his life. He hears of a mad scheme whereby humans can be reduced to the size of dolls, so, opening a doll shop in Paris, he disguises himself as an old woman and sets about his business of revenge. With method in his madness and the help of one living doll he brings about his horrible revenge. Blood-curdling in its implications, the story is so well presented and the acting of such a high standard that "The Devil Doll" never sinks to the level of a horror thriller. The photography, particularly of the dolls, is exceptional throughout. Others in the cast are Maureen O'Sullivan, Frank Lawton, Rafaela Ottiano and Henry Walthall. Grace Ford, in the role of the doll, plays it well.

Lionel Barrymore submitted to the feminine clothing allotted him good-naturedly—until bustles were introduced. He flatly refused to have anything to do with them, claiming that no Barrymore ever needed a bustle and he was not going to break the precedent. . . . Even studio biggies were refused admittance to this set, since the tricks used to get the astonishing effects in the picture were secret ones, for which a large sum had been paid to Houdini's widow, under promise of strictest secrecy. . . . Maureen O'Sullivan had to pick up a picture of her mother and look at it. So Maureen went home, got a picture of her real mother, and used it for the scene. She says her mother has always wanted to be in the movies. . . . The "doll" in the picture is played by Grace Ford and this marks her cinema debut. Grace is still surprised about it all, not having had the vaguest idea of a screen career six months ago. When a group of her dancing students, back in Tulsa,

★ 36 Hours to Kill

There are plenty of laughs and not a little excitement in this celluloider, although the story has many familiar angles. Brian Donlevy, one of those handsome and fearless G-Men, is bent on tracking down the current Public Enemy No. 1. P. E. No. 1 (Douglas Fowley) is en route to claim $150,000 and a rose-covered cottage which he has won in a Little Boy Blue contest. So Brian boards the same train, disguised as a reporter with an assistant posing as conductor. Then Gloria Stuart boards the train, also en route to Kansas City. Gloria's a fugitive from justice, but, of course, turns out to be another of those pretty reporters, sacrificing all for a story. And when you consider that Stepin Fetchit is the porter on the same train—no, not a reporter—you can bank on plenty of hilarity. Warren Hymer contributes a good "meanie" characterization, and Isabel Jewell comes through with the best bit in the picture, that of Public Enemy's Sweetheart No. 1, who finally saves the government the trouble of wiping him out. It's fast-moving entertainment, with the cast dependable in every instance.

Preview Postscript

The beautiful-but-dumb theory gets a bad blow from two stars in this celluloider, Isabel Jewell and Gloria Stuart. Gloria's a former newspaper editor and a poetess, while Isabel's an accomplished musician and Latin scholar. Both gals achieved success in these lines before turning to acting. Gloria graduated from Berkeley, went to work on the Monterey Herald and published a book of poetry before appearing in a community playhouse where a studio sleuth spotted her. Now she's raising daughter Sylvia to follow in mama's footsteps—but not the movie ones. Isabel taught Latin at Hamilton College for Women in Lexington, Kentucky, and first became interested in the stage after translating Latin plays into English for college productions. . . . Douglas Fowley's never considered anything but acting as a career since he was nine years old and made his footlight debut. Born in New York's Greenwich Village, of stage parents, Douglas hung around the wings in so many theatres that a manager finally hit on the bright idea of putting him out on the stage in order to save the cast from tripping over him. On high school graduation Douglas, Jr., turned down college scholarships and took a permanent job with a stock company, gradually working into Broadway plays and Hollywood.

★ Our Relations

(Roach-M-G-M)

Laurel and Hardy, we regret to report, won't strike you so funny this time. We find them in the roles of a couple of stodgy business men, then as their twin brothers—a couple of sailors whom the business brothers had believed hanged for lo these many years. Since puns are the order of the day in this picture, we might add that this situation makes Laurel and Hardy twice as bad. Between getting into all the expected mix-ups from mistaken identities and mistaken wives and girl friends, both sets of Laurels and Hardys get involved in a gang of racketeers who, it is finally disclosed, mean them no good. The picture goes from bad to worse—not that there aren't plenty of chuckles and a few good laughs, but the humor of each episode is built up to the point of strain. Arthur Housman is back again and still drunk. Alan Hale is good in a small role, while Daphne Pollard, Betty Healy, Iris Adrian and Lona Andre draw rather thankless roles as the wives and gal friends, respectively. We're right there rooting for the Messrs. Laurel and Hardy as a swell comedy team—but won't someone puh-lease concoct a story for them worthy of the name?

Preview Postscript

Oliver Hardy has the unique position among movie actors of becoming more valuable to his studio with every additional pound. There's a clause in his contract which leaves him jobless if he ever hits below the 180 mark, but the studio really owes him a percentage now for Hardy tips 'em at 260 . . . Stan Laurel helped write the script for this flicker and was careful to put in as many seaside locations as possible. The reason being that Stan has just purchased his first cabin-cruiser. The "Ruth L." is its name and 30 miles an hour its speed . . . There's a Laurel and Hardy Fan Club in Paris, among other places. And that postcard which stood six feet high and four feet wide out on the "Our Relations" set was from the club. On one side there is a view of gay Paree, and on the other the fans' various sentiments as to how they feel about the team. Nice idea, but an awful dust collector, said Mrs. Hardy when Oliver toted it home. Mrs. Laurel thought so, too. That's why it's at the studio now . . . Daphne Pollard is one of the smallest gals in pitchers. She's barely four feet five and earned some money one time when she was broke by giving a shoe dealer a squint at her tiny foot. He immediately staged a contest by exhibiting one of her shoes in the store window and daring any woman to come in and try it on. They all came in, being women, to see if anyone could wear it. So Daphne got a regular job exhibiting her Size 1.

★★★ Song of China

(Douglas MacLean)

Once in a while you find a picture whose beauty alone deserves raves. Rarely do you find moving pictures with beauty deserving anything more than passing notice. The "Song of China" is an exception. Almost every scene is outstandingly effective, whether the subject is a landscape, a temple, a shanty, animals or people. Even the close-ups are remarkable for their depths of expression and play of lights and shadows. The picture has been brought to this country by Douglas MacLean, but it is a Chinese production throughout—acted, directed, photographed and written by Chinese people. The story is of absorbing interest, yet far from exciting at any time. It depicts five generations of a Chinese family, from the honorable and dignified grandparents to the shoddy, jazz-mad younger generations who are in revolt against all the revered traditions of their people. Casting in the many difficult emotional roles is faultless and you will enjoy the Chinese music which is played and sung through most of the episodes.

The movie public may not be 100 per cent Chan fans, but we'll bet an autographed Garbo picture that no one has ever considered watching Charlie Chan as time wasted. Warner Oland's characterization of the Chinese gentleman-detective is always a masterpiece of suave conduct and subtle humor, in spite of the meagre plots that are often scratched up for his talents. However, this time we have a story that does justice to its star. A famous race track is used for background. The astute Mr. Chan is in his glory between dodging bullets, sleuthing out dubious situations, suspecting the most unsuspicious characters and showing up the irrepressible Keye Luke. Never have a father and son team appeared in celluloid that can beat these two. Helen Wood and Thomas Beck supply what little love interest there is. Alan Dinehart scores as usual with a meanie role while Gavin Muir and Gloria Ray are adequate in lesser roles. But, of course, it's Mr. Oland from start to finish—and Mr. Oland at his best.

Preview Postscript

Charlie Chan, Earl Derr Biggers' fictional Chinese detective, first appeared in celluloid in 1929. But it wasn't Warner Oland in the role. It was a genuine Chinese gentleman, a successful merchant in Los Angeles' Chinatown. A poor performance left Mr. Chan's activities confined to the cutting-room floor. In 1931 the studio worked up enough courage to again attempt a Charlie Channer. Warner Oland, then playing Oriental heavies, was tested for the role just because he happened to show up at the studio that day. After Oland's first picture the fan mail began arriving by the barrel. Now there are twelve pictures in the series and the studio is rushing more out as fast as possible. . . . Born in Umea, Sweden, in 1880, Warner Oland came to this country at thirteen with his family. After some amateur theatricals in a Boston high school, he decided to become a professional actor and enrolled in the Curry Dramatic School. Stage experiences followed and then Hollywood. Oland wears no make-up to achieve that Oriental appearance. The Swede is ready for the Chinese part every day by simply brushing the ends of his mustache down and his eyebrows up . . . If one Charlie Chan was so popular, mused the studio, why not two? So a year ago Keye Luke, San Francisco artist and philosophy student, was contracted as Oland's son. Luke came from Canton, China, at the age of three. He went to school in Seattle. He was doing scene designing for a studio when approached with an offer to try acting.

Many of those gnawing, nagging, painful backaches people blame on colds or strains are often caused by tired kidneys — and may be relieved when treated in the right way.

The kidneys are one of Nature's chief ways of taking acids and wastes out of the blood. A healthy person should pass about 3 pints a day and so get rid of more than 3 pounds of waste matter.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, this waste stays in the body and may become poisonous. It may start nagging backaches, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Don't let it lay you up.

Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills — used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help to flush out the 15 miles of kidney tubes. Get Doan's Pills.

New BLONDEX THE BLONDE HAIR SHAMPOO AND RINSE-

York City on thirty-five dollars a week. Thirty-five bucks is Gene Raymond's stipend, and the gal he wants to marry gets fifty. The gal is Barbara Stanwyck and she gets her fifty for modelling clothes. Gene convinces her that this is a man's world, so she quits her job and marries the guy. But the thirty-five dollars, even with stretching, can't support the household, and Barbara, without telling Gene, goes back to work. When Gene discovers it, his pride is so upset he signs up for a job in South America. But Barbara catches him at the boat, quits her job once more and they settle down to a life of bliss. The script writers conveniently forget that the last time their hero and heroine tried it they couldn't make it work. All of which means that "The Bride Walks Out" proves nothing except that it is more desirable to starve with Gene Raymond than to live without him. Barbara and Gene turn in workmanlike performances with able assistance from Helen Broderick, Ned Sparks and Robert Young.

Preview Postscript

It's been many a day since a company enjoyed themselves as did this one while making a flicker. Barbara Stanwyck is a favorite with everyone on the lot, from office boy to director, in spite of the practical jokes which she plays on them. "Puh-lease, soft peddle on the guffaws" was heard from the directors before the cameras started rolling. So constant—and so good—were the wisecracks that went on daily, that a prop man decided to record the chatter unbeknown to the cast. On the picture's completion he presented Barbara with a set of records which revealed the idiocies of the cast and prompted Miss Stanwyck to give them a big party just to hear how witty they were . . . Ned Sparks is commuting between Vancouver, B. C., and Hollywood these days. He's recently purchased an estate up there, being Canadian by birth and never having quite got over it. It's an eight-hour flight between points and Ned's in the market at present for a plane which he intends to pilot himself . . . If you're interested in the movie's idea of what constitutes a traffic jam, it's two hundred people and seventy-six automobiles. At least that's the number of extras and cars hired for that jam scene in this celluloider.

★ Sworn Enemy (M-G-M)

This picture gets off to a good start, but lets you down with a thud. Robert Young, an ambitious law student, applies for a job in a packing plant only to be beaten up at the end of his first day's work by a gang of racketeers when he refuses to hand over the best part of his pay. When the same gang wipes out his brother and his boss, Robert gets to work in earnest on the situation, aided and abetted by Lewis Stone and Florence Rice. Mr. Stone has spent the last several years getting madder and madder at the racketeers, since he's had nothing to do in jail. And, naturally, Florence Rice isn't wasting any love on them, either. So, with the help of the government and Nat Pendleton, they set to work. And right here let us tell you that it's Nat Pendleton's show from now on. As the hulking, moronic prize-fighter, Nat gives a noteworthy performance, topping every other in the film. Joseph Calleia is the gruesomely crippled leader of the gangsters and certainly provides a menacing element. The story builds up to a terrific climax through a series of hair-raising escapades—only to get the racketeers cornered in a Turkish bath.

Preview Postscript

For that Lon Chaney act of Joseph Calleia's he actually used several of the Chaney props which were in the studio wardrobe department. The canes, misshapen shoes and weights which were used in his clothing to give that peculiar dragging effect had all been the personal property of the former star . . . The hotel fire scene developed into more of a realistic one than was really comfortable. It is a city ordinance that whenever the studios want to have a fire for a scene, no matter whether it be a fire in a stove or a ten-story building burnt to the ground, the fire department must be notified and men sent out to keep an eye on the activities. Consequently, ten stalwart firemen showed up on the set, but when Florence Rice set a match to the curtains the gauzy material flamed so quickly that it took prop men, cameramen and cast, too, to extinguish the conflagration . . . Between this and the steam bath scene, Florence Rice says she lost about eight pounds. And she's one of the few in Hollywood who tries desperately to gain poundage . . . Nat Pendleton actually doesn't realize his own strength. For one of the scenes in which he is supposed to pound on a door for admittance, Nat calmly went up and knocked once, then on the second pounding he simply knocked the door down. But Nat has interesting ways of preserving his strength. F'rinstance, on the set he always has his valet sitting next to him to attend to anything of an exerting nature. His principal duty is to turn pages of the newspaper for his boss! When Nat finishes reading the funny page, he hands the paper to the valet and says "sport page" and it's hardly sooner said than done, Bob being an astute valet.

★★ Mister Cinderella

(Roach-M-G-M)

Here is Grade A slapstick if you can take it. At any rate, you'll agree that never has broad comedy been given such elegant trappings. Hal Roach's initial venture into feature-length movies is undoubtedly a success, since super-slapstick was his aim. With this in mind, he hired Jack Haley, Betty Furness, Arthur Treacher, Raymond Walburn, Monroe Owsley, Kathleen Lockhart, Robert McWade and several others whose talents are undeniable. As a setting for his gems, Mr. R. has spared no expense on country mansion sets, swanky hotels and resorts. Furthermore, he hasn't spared a single Roach gag. After exhaustive research we can't locate one missing—the police chase, the bathing-suit loss while emerging from the surf, the sprawling entrance at the ball, etc., etc. But Jack Haley's finesse is evident in even the most trying situation, while Betty Furness' characterization of the aristocratic gal who falls for Barber Haley is sincere if somewhat appalling. Arthur Treacher, of course, is grand in a too brief appearance as butler, Raymond Walburn huffs and puffs in his best manner and the rest of the cast acquit themselves creditably. So, as we were saying, if it's slapstick you're after, this is tops.

Preview Postscript

Rosina Lawrence makes her first important appearance in this film, and shows a decided chance for better ones, too. Having suffered from infantile paralysis, Rosina was a cripple all through her childhood. She loved dance music and begged her mother just to let her watch other girls taking dancing lessons. She was so inspired that gradually she began to move her legs and arms and after a long time could out-dance any girl in her class, and soon joined a chorus where she outdanced them, too. Next she came to Hollywood and danced circles around the "extras" in a musical sequence, was noticed by the director and soon was getting speaking roles . . . Kathleen Lockhart says she's still just a small-town girl at heart and would never live in the city except that she happened to marry Gene Lockhart who happens to loathe small towns. Kathleen came to this country some years ago and met Gene who proposed to her at once, showing her a numerologist's report that with the name Kathleen Lockhart she would get much further ahead in the world . . . Monroe Owsley used to go to school back in Philadelphia with Jeanette MacDonald—but neither knew much about the other until they met in Hollywood years later. Monroe hailed originally from Atlanta, Georgia, then drifted to Philadelphia where he tried working on newspapers for awhile then decided to give the stage a trial. Now he says he's still a better newspaperman than actor, but can't make any editor agree with him.

★ White Fang

This celluloider glorifies Lightning, the dog who was Buck's lady-friend wolf in "Call of the Wild." Once more this canine hero is called upon to face the terrors of the North Country for his employers and for the eventual happiness of Michael Whalen and Jean Muir. Lightning responds to the call with nobility and despatch, howling through the Alaskan wilderness in hot pursuit of such villains as John Carradine and his ilk. With almost human understanding, and surely without having read the script, he knows that good old Michael Whalen didn't really kill Jean Muir's brother. On this point he is several up on the rest of the cast, most of whom strongly suspect that Michael committed the foul act. Let it be said for Lightning that he is a dog's dog and never loses hope. You can almost see the satisfied smile on his face when Whalen's neck is transferred from the caresses of the noose to those of Miss Muir. "White Fang" is sometimes exciting, but mostly borders on burlesque. It's a barking picture that has no bite.

Preview Postscript

"The Call of the Wild" proved such an excellent midsummer picture last year with movie fans who complained it was "too hot to sit through a picture" that Fox decided to follow it up with this flicker. That touch of frost-bitten air does the trick. However, there wasn't enough of that kind of ozone while the picture was being filmed, causing considerable difficulty to the company. A turn of extremely warm weather at Truckee, where the cast was on location to shoot the snow fields, forced them back to Beverly Hills within a week. So more than three acres on the studio lot were turned into northland scenery. This meant lots of synthetic snow and for this purpose the production staff resorted to the old reliable—gypsum. It's impossible to tell gypsum from the real thing, unless you happen to have ordered it. Four tons of this chemical were strewn around the lot and for falling snow there was the other old reliable—bleached corn flakes . . . Lightning, star of this epic, is a giant German shepherd and grandson of Strongheart, one of the earliest and most famous of canine stars. Lightning goes through his histrionic activities with amazing ease. His owner, Earl Johnson, reads the script carefully, determines what the dog is to do in addition to his current tricks and teaches the new things to him in less than four days of intensive training. No oral commands are fired at this dog. Johnson directs him simply by flicking his fingers and moving his arms. All well-trained movie dogs are taught to mean it when they fight, and for this reason precautions were taken in fight scenes when Lightning attacks Carradine. A leather arm sleeve half an inch thick just barely protected the actor from the dog's savage grip.

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE—
WITHOUT CALOMEL
And You'll Jump out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

THE liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile onto the food you swallow every day. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

A mere movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up". Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. Stubbornly refuse anything else. 25c at all drug stores. © 1935. C M CO

★★★ My American Wife

Francis Lederer at his most romantic as a foreign count; Ann Sothern at her most glamorous as his American wife; Billie Burke at her most flighty as her managing mother, and Fred Stone very wholeheartedly being Fred Stone . . . well, don't miss this picture. Old Lafe Cantillon, who pushed across the country in an ox cart and founded the town of Cantillon, is horrified when he hears that his granddaughter has married one of them stuck-up, no-count "furriners." He blames it, rightly, on his socially-ambitious daughter-in-law. The fact that the furriner is a count only makes his ten-gallon hat sit at an even wilder angle on his 100 per cent American head. The whole town, headed by the rest of the Cantillon tribe which is never able to forget its financial and social importance, turns out for receptions, balls, teas and parties in honor of their titled visitor. Old Lafe sulks on his ranch. But the Count fools them all. He endures a few social functions, then he discards his uniforms and full dress for a pair of overalls and a checked shirt and goes out to the ranch to talk to Old Lafe about horses, cattle and ranching. He has a fight at One-Eyed Pete's saloon, takes to chewing tobacco, and earns the nickname of "Spike" from the amazed and delighted old pioneer. Of all the Cantillon tribe, the Count turns out to be the most genuine American. He even buys a ranch and begins to put in alfalfa.

While in England, Walter Wanger signed Joan Bennett to a nice contract, so she didn't mind cutting her vacation short to do "Wedding Present," finishing her Paramount contract. Here she is alighting from an American Airways plane.

"You Know Her Majesty's Private Tea Is Supplied by Ridgways"

SUCH a remark might well have been spoken in some cultured English home long years ago, for the tea that the great Queen Victoria drank had been blended to her taste by the quality tea house of the time—Ridgways (Est. 1836).

For almost 100 years Ridgways Teas have been the world's foremost quality teas. Queen Victoria's once private tea is now sold to the public as Ridgways "H.M.B.". For almost every taste and purse there is a—

Francis Lederer is still the good provider of Hollywood. You may recall a couple of months ago that Francis sent members of the press sacks of cabbage from his ranch, holding out a promise at the time that we would hear from his apricots as soon as they were ready. Well, good news! Last month the apricots were good and ready, and we got them, in a basket all wrapped in cellophane, with a little note from Francis saying here they were, and adding, "Next time it will be 'nuts to you'!" There's only one thing you can say to that, and we're not going to say it.

The latest thing in Hollywood is party insurance. If you're planning a party, a solicitor will insure you against anything and everything. If a guest decides to fill your swimming pool with the champagne you bought for the affair, if someone roasts marshmallows over your flaming grand piano, if a charming dropper-in tries out her skull on your staircase, you simply phone the company and they pay for everything. Our prediction is that the firm will be bankrupt in six months, but they're optimistic about the future. They say they'll even insure a Lombard party.

After the "Rhythm on the Range" preview most of the attention of the crowd outside the theatre went to Bob Burns and Martha Raye, whose comedy was the best thing in the picture. It was easy for Burns to take, for the sage of Van Buren, Ark., stands six feet two and can hold his own. Little Martha Raye, however, found herself engulfed in a sea of admirers. It was all pretty swell until she squirmed her way out of the crowd and discovered she was minus her purse and $200 worth of joolry. The price of fame!

Jane Withers' puppet show last month was a decided success. She invited producer Sol Wurtzel and a number of studio biggies and all her neighborhood pals to the world premiere in her back-yard theatre. But nature dealt a blow to drama, for just as the curtain went up the rain came down. Throwing tradition to the wind, Jane decided the show couldn't go on and led all her guests to the refreshments. Next day the postponed world premiere went on before the same distinguished audience and, to the delight of the actress-producer, there was also a repeat performance of the ice cream.

At The Fun House in Venice one night recently the barker out front shouted to the multitudes that Cary Grant, Sally Eilers, Norma Shearer and Marion Davies were inside. The crowd snickered, and passed along. The guy was frantic, because the stars he mentioned were actually in there. He finally gave up in disgust, probably mumbling that people are getting so they don't believe anything—not even an honest carnival barker.

In spite of the rumors afloat that Anita Louise is entertaining serious intentions about this person or that, they're saying she still casts an amorous eye in the direction of Ross Alexander. However, there's mamma's objections to overcome, but Love may find a Way.

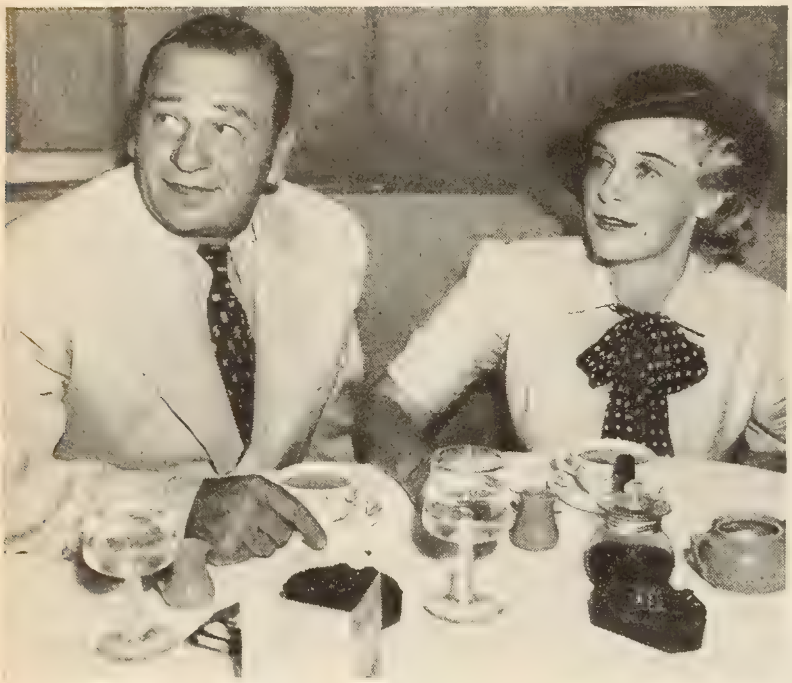
Pretty Olivia de Havilland has managed to side-step romance rumors, but here Scotty caught her with James Blakeley beaming admiringly upon her.

Just to prove that James Stewart doesn't date Ginger Rogers all the time, here she is dining at the "Troc" with Phil Huston, another attentive swain.



Not to be outdone by younger men-about-town, Wally Beery takes his best gal to the Trocadero, too. You're right, it's blonde Mrs. B. herself.

As for Luise Rainer, she seems to keep the town guessing. What with Willie Wyler one night and now, above, with Clifford Odets dining at the Brown Derby.

Speaking of "San Francisco," it may surprise you to learn that Spencer Tracy, who did such a swell job in the role of the priest, originally turned down the assignment. He had been starred in "Fury," he argued, and couldn't see why he should accept a subordinate role in any picture. His bosses finally pinned him down, Tracy took the role, and it turned out to be one of the best things he's done on the screen. It just goes to show that sometimes even your boss can be right.

Most of Hollywood's sympathy these days goes to Director E. H. Griffith. He's directing "Ladies in Love" and his cast includes Constance Bennett, Janet Gaynor, Loretta Young and Simone Simon. Most any one of these gals is a hard day's work for most directors so everyone's wondering how E. H. is doing with four of them. Our guess is that the ladies will be trying so hard to steal each other's scenes they'll forget they're supposed to be temperamental.

During Richard Arlen's recent absence in England his swimming pool became a summer resort for all the kids in the neighborhood. One day a future producer aged 11, took over the place and charged a dime admission, including the use of a ladder to climb over the Arlen fence. The Arlen caretakers wrote to Dick and got this back: "Ban the promoter, but let the other kids swim all they like. And if the promoter happens to reform, let him in, too." P. S. He reformed overnight.

Out of all the pictures made in Hollywood from January to July; here, according to a survey made by The Hollywood Reporter, these were the ten biggest money-makers: "Mutiny on the Bounty," "Follow the Fleet," "Rose Marie," "San Francisco," "Wife vs. Secretary," "Captain Blood," "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town," "The Littlest Rebel," "Modern Times" and "The Magnificent Obsession." Among the no-profit group were: "The Princess Comes Across," "Love Before Breakfast," "One Rainy Afternoon" and "Dancing Pirate." And the low for the season was Hecht and MacArthur's "Soak the Rich."

[UNTIL SHE SMILES]

She evades all close-ups . . . Dingy teeth and tender gums destroy her charm . . . She ignored "PINK TOOTH BRUSH"

IT'S ONLY human nature to wait breathlessly for such a lovely girl to turn her proud head—to reward your admiration with the glory of her smile!

And it's only human nature to resent it, like a physical blow, when she does turn, when she does smile—and all her loveliness turns to ashes! For when a smile betrays dull and dingy teeth—tender and ailing gums—no glory of eyes or hair can save loveliness.

NEVER NEGLECT "PINK TOOTH BRUSH"

Too many soft foods . . . too little work and resistance for the natural health of our teeth and gums—there are the reasons why that dental warning "pink tooth brush" is so often in evidence.

And for the sake of your own loveliness and your own health—if you see that "tinge of pink" on your own tooth brush, see your dentist. You may be in for serious trouble. But he is far more likely to explain the menace of our "modern menus" —to tell you to take better care of your gums, to give them more exercise. And he may tell you—he often does—to switch to Ipana Tooth Paste and massage.

Play safe—get Ipana today. Rub a little extra Ipana into your gums every time you brush your teeth! For Ipana is especially designed to help your gums as well as clean your teeth. You'll soon notice an improvement in the health of your gums. New circulation wakens lazy tissues. Gums grow stronger. They feel firmer. They look better. And they'll certainly be far safer from the threat and danger of serious gum troubles.

The first ten days of Ipana and massage will show an improvement. And thirty days will convince you that you should have changed to this modern, sensible health measure long ago.

"Folks, Meet 'OIWIN'"

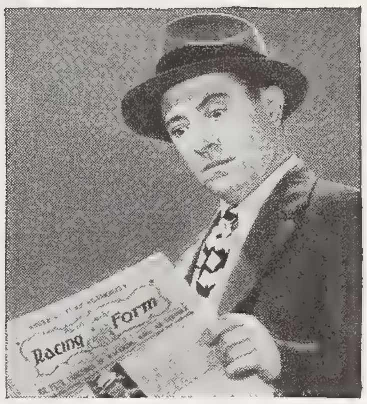
('Oiwin' is Brooklynese for the good old Anglo-Saxon name of Erwin)

To the bride and neighbors he was a polite and milk-toasty Erwin, but to the mob he was 'Oiwin'— the horse-picking demon who gave bookmakers financial D. T.s! A gentle Jekyll in Jersey . . . but a Hyde-de-ho in the betting ring.

A candid camera study of 'Oiwin' . . . as the marvel of the ages picks a long shot and almost wrecks the betting industry.

Now it can be told! Nearly every star comedian in Hollywood wanted to play 'Oiwin'. "I'll buy the play," said one . . . "I don't want any salary. Just give me the chance and a percentage," said another world-famous funnyman . . . But Warner Bros. decided to give this coveted acting plum to Frank McHugh—not because he was the best-known actor to do 'Oiwin'—but because in their opinion he was by far the best suited. How glad you'll be they made this choice when you meet 'Oiwin' on the screen!

"I just love a bettin' man, Oiwin . . . especially if he keeps winning all the time."



Every time 'Oiwin' looked at a racing sheet the bookmakers took more aspirin.

"Oiwin, you made us millionaires . . . we want to do some little thing for you."

Joe's changed cinema stooges! Yep, his duck is now a lamb

The Joe Penners pedal around between scenes of "Roamin' Around."

By Robert McIlwaine

WHAT IS to be the fate of poor Emily Duck—that not so famous cousin of Donald Duck? Joe Penner, alone, doesn't speculate. In fact, he blithely tells all within earshot that she's retired—exiled to the rarified atmosphere of Long Island. Can this mean she is to suffer the same dark death that is the lot of many a duck—just another bird swimming in brown gravy, and all to appease the appetite of the fickle public?

When questioned regarding his future, Donald Duck remained silent, steadfastly refusing to utter so much as one quack, undoubtedly preferring to await the incoming mails to see if there can be any news which will be good.

Padre Joe Penner admits. "I've retired Miss Duck on a nice pension, and have not, as has been erroneously reported, relegated her to the home for old ducks. You see, I've become typed and that's bad. Under the terms of my latest contract I work with a new and more appropriate accomplice—a black sheep!"

We marveled at the casual manner with which Joe informed us that no longer would his long-time leadin' lady be with him. New opportunities and bigger goals are in the offing and so there is to be a newcomer to aid and abet him in his tomfoolery.

"You know, I've just returned from Europe where Eleanor and I had a wonderful time," Penner began, adroitly changing the subject. "While we were in Paris, 'Collegiate' was playing, and all the French kids seemed crazy about it. I got a big kick when they came up to me and began jabbering away. I don't understand French, but when they shoved a pencil and pad under my nose, I knew that in any language that meant an autograph.

"The same thing happened in London and I sure was grateful! It makes me feel that I'm earning my check every Saturday, and not just hanging on the payroll because I've got them on the dotted line."

As Joe related his experiences, a far away gleam came into his eyes, as they wrinkled at the corners suggesting a smile, and we wondered what new, amusing incident he would relate.

"I guess," he began finally, "I get twice the kick out of my pictures being successful, because in the old days I never lasted at anything more than a few weeks. I was the original All-American flop! After years in vaudeville, I appeared in several musical comedies, but they were like the Arabs—after a few performances, they quietly folded their tents and disappeared into the night."

"There was the 'Greenwich Follies,' which did run a little longer than usual. The best thing I can remember about even that is the fact that I met Eleanor Vogt—she was playing in the show—and later married her. And what a campaign I staged to win her, for it was no easy job to convince Eleanor I wasn't a total flop!

"After that I appeared in several other shows, equally short-lived. There were 'Tattle Tales,' 'The Vanderbilt Revue,' and 'East Wind.' They were usually on and off so soon that I hardly knew I was in, before I was out again. However, just when I'd think I was definitely finished, something would turn up and I would get another chance. Guess I've been pretty lucky at that!"

It was at this crucial period in Penner's career that Emily Duck came into prominence, attaining star billing long before her now famous cousin, Donald, had the faintest idea of what the movie bug was. In fact, to him it could easily have been a six-legged monster creeping about in the dark of night.

"During one of my vaudeville performances, I happened to ask, 'Wanna buy a duck?' The remark brought down the house. I used a straight man in the act and broke in at intervals with,

WE SALUTE "DODSWORTH"

MODERN
EXCEPTIONAL MERIT

Modern Screen presents its Award of Merit to this fine entertainment

We extend heartiest congratulations to all those who contributed to make "Dodsworth" a picture of which the industry may well be proud, a picture which you cannot afford to miss.

William Wyler, the director of this Samuel Goldwyn special, Walter Huston and Ruth Chatterton, its most important players, each comes in for high commendation and praise.

Modern Screen will award each month a Medal to the most outstanding production about to be released, the film we feel will enhance the appreciation and enjoyment of the movie-making art. Let our Medal picture serve as your guide to the highest type of screen entertainment available, and watch for its announcement each month.

Our Medal Award film, "Dodsworth," a Samuel Goldwyn Production, released through United Artists, reviewed by Leo Townsend.

After an illustrious career on the stages of New York, London and points East and West, Sinclair Lewis' "Dodsworth," dramatized by Sidney Howard, comes to the screen as one of the most engrossing and completely satisfying motion pictures of the year. As a play, "Dodsworth" relieved New York reviewers of an abundance of laudatory adjectives; as a picture it will receive nothing but the highest praise from critics and audiences alike.

First of all, Walter Huston's portrayal of Sam Dodsworth is by far the year's finest acting. Mr. Huston has been absent from the screen so long one forgets his artistry. "Dodsworth" will certainly establish him again among the screen's ten best actors. In the feminine lead, Ruth Chatterton plays Dodsworth's nagging wife with such honesty and such understanding that one can feel audiences pulling for Sam when he finally walks out on her. It is probably Chatterton's best screen work. In the role of "the other woman" to whom Dodsworth goes for companionship and a new life, Mary Astor is quietly beautiful and sincere. Plaudits should also go to Director William Wyler, who has, with "These Three" and now "Dodsworth," established himself as one of the screen's most intelligent directors.

All in all, "Dodsworth" is THE GREAT AMERICAN PICTURE. It is the engrossing story of two Americans told with humor and understanding. It is a definite achievement in motion pictures. It is human, it is tremendously entertaining and it will thrill you with its emotional ending. If there is such a thing in motion pictures, "Dodsworth" is literature.

We bet that you would never guess glamorous Gail Patrick's most burning ambition. It certainly is unique!

Gail is from Alabama and she seems to combine Southern allure with driving Northern energy. She thinks that dignity pays big dividends for a girl and tells you exactly why.

SOUTHERN CHARMER

I GUESS it's true, all right, what they say about Dixie—only they don't say half enough!

You see, all my life I've been hearing raves about the charm, the beauty, the what-have-you, of the Southern gals. But I didn't believe it.

Then all of a sudden I met Gail Patrick. From that moment, needless to say, I was perfectly willing to believe every word about the charm, the beauty, and all the little et ceteras.

Of course, I went to see her with an open mind, but the results would have been exactly the same even if I'd been prejudiced beforehand.

The first thing I discovered was that the camera hadn't told us half the truth about her. She is ever so much prettier in reality than she is on the screen. Moreover, she's not at all the sultry, languorous type. She has a vivid, alive look; black hair that fairly glistens with vitality; brilliant, long-lashed dark eyes, and a sparkling smile. Southern softness and Irish vivacity; that's the impression you get.

Yes, she's partly Irish—on her father's side—and the family name is really

Gail has steadily worked her way up to leading roles. Now she has the feminine lead with Lew Ayres in the mystery thriller, "Murder with Pictures."

Fitzpatrick (the studio shortened it for marquee purposes). Her mother is an Alabaman, whose people have been Southerners for generations.

We've been hearing that silly phrase, "beautiful but dumb," so much that we've come to believe it and are always bowled over when we find a girl who's just as clever as she is gorgeous. Gail Patrick is one of these. A campus belle who made good in Hollywood. Still, she would have made good in any other place, or any other work, just as well and just as easily. Don't have any doubts about that!

AFTER GRADUATING from high school in her home town, Birmingham, Alabama, she went to Howard College. Besides reigning at junior proms she was improving each shining hour by winning no end of scholastic honors as well.

Howard College conferred upon her the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and she matriculated in law at the University of Alabama. Her ambition then—and now— did not lie in the direction of Hollywood at all. Her big dream is to become a very fine lawyer and eventually, Governor of Alabama! She has already set a tentative date for her candidacy, and though it's still a long way off, I don't in the least doubt she'll make it —if by that time she still wants it.

By Juliette Laine

Gail's entry in the Paramount contest that brought her to Hollywood was purely a lark. In fact, she felt so certain that nothing would come of it that she insisted that the studio furnish her a round-trip ticket before she started!

She won the contest, but even so, things didn't look any too rosy, just at first. The studio liked her. So did everyone else. Yet every time she was lined up for an important role in a picture dat ole debbil, Southern accent, would pop up and spoil everything. However, instead of crying about it or getting temperamental, Gail enrolled at the studio school for a course of training. Then, very cautiously, she began feeling her way along in a string of minor roles.

With all this heavily intellectual background, I could hardly ask her the sort of questions I ask of a dizzier gal, and as an aura of dignity seemed to envelop everything I've ever heard (Continued on page 102)

What are the 8 "MUSTS" doctors demand of a laxative?

YOUR doctor's deepest concern is your health. And any medicinal product even remotely connected with your health assumes great importance in his mind.

You will discover, for instance, that physicians have a definite standard of requirements for a laxative before giving it their approval. Read these 8 points carefully. They are very important.

WHAT DOCTORS REQUIRE OF A LAXATIVE:

It should be dependable.
It should be mild and gentle.
It should be thorough.
Its merit should be proven by the test of time.
It should not form a habit.
It should not over-act.
It should not cause stomach pains.
It should not nauseate, or upset digestion.

EX-LAX MEETS THE DOCTOR'S REQUIREMENTS

Ex-Lax checks on every point the doctor looks for in a laxative. Not merely on one or two. But on all the points that the medical profession includes in its code. You can have no better proof of the confidence Ex-Lax enjoys than the fact that many physicians use it in their own homes.

When Nature forgets— remember

EX-LAX

THE ORIGINAL CHOCOLATED LAXATIVE

For over 30 years mothers and grandmothers have given Ex-Lax to their children. Why? . . . Because the very qualities that make Ex-Lax an ideal laxative for you are doubly important to a child's welfare. Ex-Lax has proved so satisfactory in millions of cases that it has become the largest-selling laxative in the world.

CHECK THE DOCTOR'S FINDINGS YOURSELF

Try Ex-Lax the next time you need a laxative, and you will see how right the doctor is. For Ex-Lax is mild and gentle. It works thoroughly, but without the slightest discomfort. You'll experience no stomach pains, no nausea, no weak "dragged down" feeling. And Ex-Lax will not form a habit—you don't have to keep on increasing the dose to get results.

A REAL PLEASURE TO TAKE

Ex-Lax tastes just like pure, delicious chocolate . . . so different from harsh, nasty-tasting cathartics. It's the perfect laxative for all—children and grown-ups alike. All drug stores have Ex-Lax in 10c and 25c sizes. Or if you prefer to try Ex-Lax at our expense, mail the coupon.

BACHELORS BY CHOICE

By Mack Hughes

(Left) Nelson Eddy wouldn't ask any woman to share the gypsy existence he leads, what with the continual whirl of concert tours and movies that take up most of his time.

(Below) Michael Bartlett is another singing star whom no female has yet been able to lure to the altar. But unlike Mr. Eddy, he's willing if he can only find the right girl.

EVERY SENSIBLE, upright young man is saving up for a rainy day, a roadster and a wife. If he hasn't the latter, you may be sure it is invariably because of money—or the lack of it. Occasionally, of course, he has not had an opportunity to meet the girl. But, armed with a pocketbook, it usually isn't difficult to go places and get acquainted. So, nine times out of ten, when a gentleman from Cadiz, Ohio or Bangor, Maine is unwed, it's due to little cash or less chance to find a prospective Missus.

But there are Hollywood men enjoying single blessedness because they want to. Bachelors by choice. There are many young women who would deem it a pleasure to tread the bridal path with Nelson Eddy, Cesar Romero, Brian Aherne or Michael Bartlett, if the aforementioned gentlemen would only ask 'em. But these Lotharios, with fame and fortune and "what it takes" to get a wife, have so far intentionally escaped matrimony—and for reasons which they will discuss.

It isn't too easy to get Nelson Eddy to expound on any subject, but, having finished "Maytime" and while getting set for a forthcoming concert tour, Mr. Eddy not only did a little holding forth, but actually talked about the ladies.

GOD BLESS 'EM," said Nelson, and strictly on the reverent side, too. Nope, there was no implication of "and keep 'em—for somebody else" either.

"I'm not only an actor, but worse yet, a singer. Can you imagine a woman putting up with a singer? Great guns! I can't smoke. My voice. I can't stay up late at parties. My voice. I can't hang around in the night air. My voice. Some fun! I'm married already. Yes, you've guessed it—to my voice. It's my chief concern. It's my only concern. And while I have it—and a singing voice is very fickle—I plan to take care of it, to devote all my time and everything I've got to it.

"Besides the voice, there are tours—concert, movies, opera. All over the place. Different cities different weeks. Would it be fair to ask a woman who is naturally interested in a home—and what woman isn't or shouldn't be—to share this gypsy existence? It would not. Even though the gypsying might be done at the best hotels, it would be a hardship. No, I'm not going to think of marriage until I can afford to get mad and shout. You see, I can't even afford a decent outburst of temper now. Yes, you've guessed it. My voice."

Well, a voice may be a very fine and lucrative asset, but you can see, too, that it has its definite drawbacks. So, let us shout for a strong, wind-breaking cigar and get on to Cesar Romero.

Cesar is every girl's dream of romance. He is Latin-looking and, what's more, Latin acting. That seems to be the important point. On the screen, he invariably wins the gal in the last reel, but off the screen, he claims it's quite different. Indeed, his lack of success in this direction has given him an inferiority complex. But let him tell it.

They certainly have what it takes, but these players are still single! Why?

Cesar Romero is almost every girl's dream of romance—tall, dark and handsome! Still he seems slated for bachelorhood.

YOU SEE," confessed Romero, "I've been jilted and—not only once. It seems that I'm the pal type. Awful, isn't it? But true. I'm the guy whom the girl asks how she can get the other guy. At first, I thought it was a gag. But when a few of them asked me, I began to wonder. They treat me mostly like a brother and seldom as a beau. Why, didn't Sally Blane marry (Cont'd on page 102)

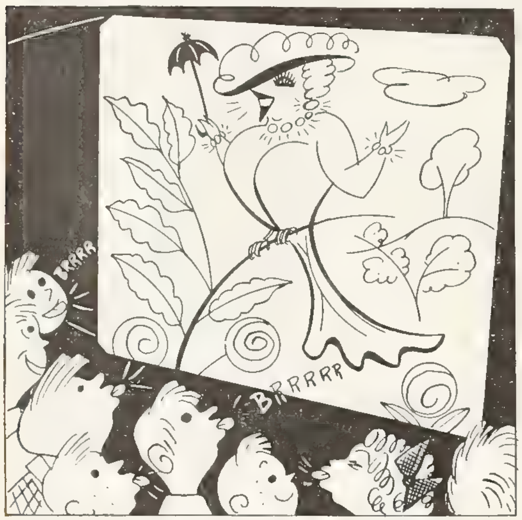
Tattle-Tale Casts

Since it is a well-established fact that the American public likes to be fooled, one wonders why Hollywood is falling into the habit of dead-give-away casting.

No one expects to go to a "David Copperfield" or a "Romeo and Juliet" and come away surprised at the outcome, but one does expect a new story from the usual run of Hollywood outputs and, what is more, one wishes to be uncertain about the outcome.

There's the Fred MacMurray formula, for instance. Fred always gets the girl and I find it hard to work up any suspense even when the heroine seems about to capitulate to some star of equal rank, as in "Hands Across the Table," "Reckless," and "The Bride Comes Home." Walter Connolly, the perennial genial cop, never makes an arrest that arouses suspense in my bosom, for Mr. C.'s arrests are always packed full of human understanding and I know that the hero will not suffer at his hands. Likewise, Lionel Stander can't scare me, for all the threatening mugs he makes behind a gun. I know now that only the two Bruces, Cabot and Barton, ever harm the heroine.



A South Carolina mother puts in a plea for cartoons that the kids will really enjoy. Another "Three Little Pigs," f'rinstance.

Henry Stephenson may storm through dozens of feet of intricately plotted film without arousing any anxiety, for we know him to be kind at heart, generous and tactful.

Of course, any girl cast with William Powell must go through a number of cold shoulders, lockings out of his apartment, and other manifestations of his complete indifference to her charms. But in the end he has been in love with her all along and his brusqueness only hid a bashful heart overflowing.

Frankly, I think we movie-goers would enjoy being taken unawares occasionally.

Spencer Tracy stole "San Francisco" right from under the noses of Jeanette MacDonald and Clark Gable, claims a South Dakota girl.

$1.00 Prize Letter

The Case Against Mr. Tracy

Mr. R. People has brought suit against Spencer Tracy, accusing him of picture-stealing. The case continues, People on the stand, the District Attorney questioning him:

"Where did you see Mr. Tracy picture-stealing?"

"In 'San Francisco.' "

"From whom?"

"Right from under the noses of Jeanette MacDonald and Clark Gable."

"Any others?"

"No! Isn't stealing a picture from those two cinema favorites enough?"

"What time did the actual theft take place?"

"I was suspicious of him around 8:30 p.m. but by 10:30, I was positive."

"How was Mr. Tracy dressed?"

"In black, like a priest."

"Any queer actions?"

"Yes, he acted so much like a priest that if I hadn't known he was Spencer Tracy, I'd have gone to Confession right then and there."

"Any other witnesses to the Tracy pilfering?"

"A whole theatre full of them that night, would have been more, only they had to turn them away."

The case went to the jury. Judge Public handed down the verdict: "Spencer Tracy, you are hereby found guilty of being the greatest picture-stealer of all ages. You are therefore sentenced to hard labor on the M-G-M lot."—Helen Noteboom, Selby, S. D.

Exit platinum coquette,
For Harlow now has gone brownette,
The sun that made her locks shine bright
Now ridicules its mousey plight.
This ordinary brownish pate
Replaces that which made her great.

Each picture sees her more demure.
Go siren! Enter girls with souls!
She'll soon be playing Gaynor's roles.

The Autograph Problem

My hobby is autograph collecting. About fifty per cent of the stars I write to take the trouble to answer. A few of those who have sent personally signed photos to me are Helen Mack, Spencer Tracy, Harvey Stephens and Bette Davis. Several others responded with courteous notes and enclosed the requested autographs. Among these were Madeleine Carroll, Jean Arthur, Julie Haydon and Joe E. Brown.

Miriam Hopkins and Katharine Hepburn ignored my desire for signatures, but enclosed price lists for purchase of their photos.

Many letters are addressed to the studios and do not reach the players for some time and often the star is engaged in a picture and cannot take the time to answer immediately. These delays must be expected but when a star fails to make any acknowledgement whatsoever of the letters and gifts the loyal public sends, then the fans must come to the conclusion that some stars do not deserve the support of the public which, after all, is responsible for the huge salaries they receive.—Harvey Helen Lewis, Sioux City, Iowa.

Cartoons for Children?

A short time ago I took my five-year-old son with me to a local theatre. When a colored cartoon was shown, he was immensely pleased, as were several other children near us. The cartoon was "Who Killed Cock Robin?" I may be wrong, but I'm under the impression that those pictures are primarily to amuse children. If that is true, then it failed.

I heard several half-grown boys behind me snickering as "Jenny Wren," a parody of Mae West, with a high bust, wiggling hips and a sexy voice, flirted with the Judge, and later indulged in a kiss with Cock Robin. The smaller children merely looked puzzled and disappointed with the whole thing.

Please have more cartoons like "The Three Little Pigs," "Water Babies," etc., unless, of course, I'm wrong and those comedies are for grown-ups and not for little children.—Mrs. E. DeLamater, Charleston, S. C.

Nelson Eddy at Home

I want to tell you how Nelson Eddy was received here in his home town during a recent concert tour. Thousands of people had gathered in the Metropolitan Theatre to hear him sing. The buzz of their excited voices was drowned out by the thunderous applause which greeted Mr. Eddy as he came on the stage with Theodore Paxson, his accompanist, and Governor Theodore Frances Green. The latter said that he considered it an honor to have been chosen "the one of us" (that's how he expressed it) to introduce the baritone to "the all of us."

Then Mr. Eddy said, "Ladies and gentlemen, and all you school chums out there, I came here with a big chest, but now I can't help feeling a little humble and modest. A long time ago a little girl said if I ever came back to Rhode Island some day she'd give me a kiss, and there was a little boy who promised me a sock on the nose. As for that kiss, I'm hoping for success before the evening's over." And he preluded his singing with, "I'm a little nervous, but I'll do the best I can."

"The Song of the Flea," in particular, was delightful because of the comical grimaces Nelson made as he sang it. His rendition of "Evening Star," too, brought down the house with applause. And everyone admired him for the generous way in which he shared the applause with his accompanist, who also rendered a solo.—Betty Seidel, Providence, R. I.

FREDERICS Vita-Tonic and Vitron Permanent Waves may cost a trifle more than "cheap" nondescript permanents, but you will find, by actual count, that more of your friends have Frederics Permanents than any other kind. And here is why:

When you have a Frederics Permanent your hair is waved "naturally"—gently. The deep, soft, lovely waves and enchanting curls are radiantly beautiful, flattering, becoming. Easy to arrange for day and evening.

By a new system of thermostatic heat control, Frederics waves your hair with less than one-half the heat formerly required. None of the natural oils are extracted from your hair. That's why Frederics Permanents last so much longer—why they are 50% cooler.

Beware of "cheap" permanents. These harmful processes contain dangerous and injurious chemicals. They require excessive heat which leaves your hair harsh, dry, brittle and unmanageable.

Be sure that 30 or more of these genuine Vita-Tonic and Vitron Wrappers are used on your hair. Insist on their use for your own protection! Sample Wrappers to take with you when going for your Frederics Permanent will be sent on request.

Send for a list of Authorized Frederics Salons in your neighborhood and our interesting booklet, "There's A Big Difference in Permanent Waves." Include 10c in silver or stamps and we will send you a beautiful, translucent cigarette lighter (purse size).

Each coupon has been tabulated, so if you have requested any of these, kindly consider yours automatically responsible.

GINGER ROGERS: Dancing won Ginger her chance in the movies, and dancing has pushed her straight to the top of the ladder. Born Virginia Katherine McMath on July 16, 1911, in Independence, Mo., she spent her girlhood at Fort Worth, Tex. It was there that she attended school and at the age of 15 won the Texas Charleston Contest. She was given a 4 weeks' vaudeville contract, then came to New York where she joined a stock company in Brooklyn. Next she was signed for "Top Speed," a musical revue, and from there went into the New York Company of "Girl Crazy" which ran 45 weeks. This resulted in Ginger's being signed to a movie contract, her first picture being "Young Man of Manhattan" in 1930. She is 5 feet 5 inches tall, weighs 115 pounds and has red hair set off by blue eyes. Dancing is her hobby, she plays a fair game of tennis and is fond of riding, swimming and golf. Edward Jackson Culpepper was her first husband, when she was very young, and Lew Ayres, from whom she is now separated, was her second. They were married on November 14, 1934. "Swing Time" is her most recent picture, but she is scheduled for a straight dramatic role in "Mother Carey's Chickens" after which she will join Mr. Astaire again in "Watch Your Step." Write her at RKO-Radio Studios, 780 Gower St., Hollywood, Calif.

JOHN BARRETT-LETENDRE, Mont Vernon, N. H.—Fredric March, Elissa Landi, Claudette Colbert, Charles Laughton and Ian Keith were starred in "Sign of the Cross." WAMPAS stands for Western Associated Motion Picture Advertisers. Mary Brian was among the 13 Wampas Baby Stars of 1926. The others were: Mary Astor, Joyce Compton, Dolores Costello, Joan Crawford, Marceline Day, Dolores Del Rio, Janet Gaynor, Sally Long, Edna Marion, Sally O'Neill, Vera Reynolds and Fay Wray. And most of these little girls made good!

DICK POWELL: Richard E. Powell crooned his first croon on November 14, 1904, in Mountain View, Ark. Just a country boy until he was 12, he and his two brothers, Howard and Luther, had fine times together till the day when the whole family took off for Little Rock, Ark., where their education began in earnest. During grade school and college there, Dick took up the art of saxophone, cornet and clarinet playing, besides which he sang in the church choir and at weddings and funerals. Next, he organized an orchestra, then made a fatal stab at vaudeville in St. Louis, thereafter hastening home. Mildred Maund became his wife and life went on until a visiting orchestra signed him to a contract and took him on tour. After that, Dick held various positions, ending up as master of ceremonies in a Pittsburgh theatre for 3 years. The talent scouts "got him" and in 1932 Dick made his screen debut in "Blessed Event." His hobbies include music, flying, golf, swimming, horseback riding, bridge and football games, to say nothing of making amateur movies. He is 6 feet tall, weighs 172 pounds, has blue eyes and auburn hair. His first marriage was terminated a long time ago, and now Joan Blondell seems to be the object of his affections. "Stage Struck" and "Gold Diggers of 1937," both with Miss Blondell as his leading lady, are the films in which he is currently appearing. Write him at Warner Brothers Studios, Burbank, Calif.

LORRAINE LEGATZKE, Chicago, Ill.—Doubtless you're not the only one who's been wondering what has happened to James Cagney. Here's the story. He and his studio had a violent disagreement with the result that Mr. Cagney has not made a picture since "Ceiling Zero." The matter is still unsettled, but meantime Jimmy has signed with a new independent studio for one picture and is scheduled to make "Great Guy" for them in the near future.

JEANETTE MacDONALD: Jeanette has changed, cinematically speaking. Not that she hasn't always been a swell actress and a grand songstress, but somehow her last two pictures with Nelson Eddy have given her a terrific boost with the fans. Born in Philadelphia, Pa., on June 18, 1907, she is of Scotch-American descent. There she attended grammar school, but completed her education in New York, where her family moved. Through the aid of one of her two sisters, then playing in New York musical shows, she obtained a chorus job in a musical revue. Then following an engagement with "The Night Boat" company as a chorus girl and understudy. A small part in "Irene" came next, after which Jeanette had a more important role in "Tangerine." Her first real success came with a leading role in "Fantastic Fricassee" which brought her a contract for a series of musical comedies. In 1930 Maurice Chevalier picked her to play opposite him in "The Love Parade," and Jeanette has been a Hollywoodite ever since. She is 5 feet 5 inches tall, weighs 120 pounds and has red-gold hair and green eyes. She likes to meet new people, see new places, is fond of swimming, dancing, riding and the theatre. She plays the piano, reads mystery novels and collects tiny figures playing musical instruments. Oddly enough, Miss MacDonald has never become a Mrs., but she's engaged now to Gene Raymond and the wedding will be soon. "San Francisco" is the lady's latest, and "Maytime" is scheduled for her, again with Nelson Eddy. Her address is Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Washington Blvd., Culver City, Calif.

DIANA WYCLIF, Kyushu, Japan—Yes, Ricardo Cortez has been working in pictures lately. He recently completed "Postal Inspector" and will be seen soon in "The Case of the Black Cat," which is a Warner Brothers picture.

ERIC LINDEN: His is the story of a successful "come-back," in spite of the fact that he's pretty young to have had such an experience. Born in New York City on September 14, 1911, of Swedish descent, young Linden attended the New York high schools and put in two years at Columbia University, where he was one of the youngest students ever to enroll. As a youth he worked at a variety of jobs—errand boy, newsboy, delivery boy—but even when he was 15 he knew there were two things he wanted most to be. They were actor and writer. While still at Columbia, where he was bettering the latter talent, an agent of the Theatre Guild discovered his dramatic ability and signed him with that group. For two years Eric worked with them, then went to Paris to play juvenile leads in three productions. In July, 1931, Hollywood claimed him and he made his debut in "Are These Our Children?" Followed several other successful pictures and then the disappointment in love which sent him to Europe to "get away from it all." On his return, Eric appeared in a few small roles just to keep himself occupied, then made up his mind definitely that he wanted a new start. In preparation for this he came to New York for a stage production, then picked his unforgettable role in "Ah, Wilderness" for the come-back. Result—he now has a long term contract with Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Washington Blvd., Culver City, Calif., and recently completed a part in "Old Hutch." Right now he's scheduled to be seen with Cecilia Parker in "In His Steps." Five feet 9 inches tall, Eric weighs 140 pounds, has brown eyes and brown hair. He is fond of all outdoor sports and writing is his favorite hobby. His heart is quite mended now. Perhaps Cecilia Parker has made it whole again.

LUCILLE HUSTED, Elyria, Ohio—Lawrence Tibbett is at present working on a new picture entitled "Under Your Spell." It will probably be released some time in November. The earthquake scene in "San Francisco" has caused a great deal of discussion. Those who witnessed this disaster seem to agree, however, that the sound effects in the picture were reproduced excellently.

MERLE OBERON: Her real name is Estelle Merle O'Brien Thompson, and she was born on the French-Dutch Island of Tasmania on February 19, 1911. Her father was an English army officer, her mother English and French-Dutch. Merle went to school in Bombay and Calcutta. There she joined a theatrical society with which she sang and danced. When she was 17 her uncle took her to England, France, Italy and Switzerland. She objected so strenuously to going home that he allowed her to stay, giving her $100 and a steamer ticket for home. Her money gone and ticket "cashed in" Merle finally accepted a position as chorus girl in the Cafe de Paris. She began to get extra work in the British movie studios, was "discovered" by Alexander Korda, and was cast in several pictures. "The Private Life of Henry VIII" bettered her chances. Then came "The Battle," "Broken Melody," "The Private Life of Don Juan" and finally "The Scarlet Pimpernel." "Folies Bergere" was her first American picture, and she has stayed here ever since. Miss Oberon is 5 feet 2 inches tall, weighs 112 pounds, has chestnut hair and hazel-green eyes. She is superstitious, likes to read biographies, is fond of animals and perfume. She has no hobbies, enjoys sleep and good food. Since she has been in Hollywood, David Niven has been her constant escort. Some say wedding bells are not far off. Under contract to Samuel Goldwyn Studios, 7210 Santa Monica Blvd., Hollywood, Cal., she is scheduled to make "Love Under Fire" with Brian Aherne and David Niven, as her next picture.

EMELDA BROOKS, Tulsa, Okla.—Don't let all these Powells confuse you. William, Dick and Eleanor Powell are absolutely no relation to each other. Paul Muni was born in Lemberg, Austria, October 14, 1895. He is married to Bella Finkel. James Cagney was born in New York City on July 17, 1904. Shirley Temple made her advent into this world in Santa Monica, Calif., on April 23, 1929.

MICHAEL WHALEN: Wilkes-Barre, Pa., was Michael's birthplace on a certain June 30 some twenty-odd years ago. As a lad he lived in Altoona, Pittsburgh, Reading and Pottsville, and was given a splendid musical education by his parents. For 10 years young Mike kept at the piano, but when he was 17 and announced his intention of becoming a professional musician his family objected. Hastily they insisted that he go into business, getting him a job in a Woolworth store. Two years later, when he was 23, Michael had become manager of 3 Woolworth stores simultaneously. After his father's death, however, Michael became unhappy in this work, took to the piano again and finally resigned to come to New York. There he was given an audition and signed by Eva Le Gallienne for a year. Having a fine baritone voice, he next turned to radio, but in 1932 decided to go to Hollywood. For three years he tried to gain access to the studios unsuccessfully, meanwhile taking various theatrical assignments to keep things going. Scouts from the studios first spotted him when he played in a Los Angeles production, then things began to break for him. He was given three contract offers at one ime—and the day he made his choice he had only 27¢ in his pockets. On October 7, 1935, Michael started work in "Professional Soldier" and has been under contract to 20th Century-Fox Studios, Box 900, Beverly Hills, Calif., ever since. Six feet 2 inches tall, he weighs 170 pounds and has dark brown hair and gray eyes. For recreation he swims and hikes, his favorite color is green and he has several pet Sealyham dogs. "Sing, Baby, Sing" is his most recent film, and he will be seen next in "The Man I Marry," with Doris Nolan. Mr. Whalen is not married.

VIRGINIA CHAPPLE, Greenfield, Ind. — Robert Montgomery's most recent picture is "Piccadilly Jim." Joel McCrea is that gentleman's real name and he will be 31 on November 5. 1905 is the year of his birth.

OLIVIA DE HAVILLAND: Born in Tokyo, Japan, on July 1, 1916, of English parentage, Miss de Havilland was brought to America when she was 3 years old. She lived in San Francisco, then Saratoga, Calif., where she attended grammar school, Notre Dame Convent and the Los Gatos Union High School. Her girlhood ambition was to become a teacher, an author or an actress. Along with playing hockey, public speaking and debating, Olivia appeared in school theatricals. While emoting in the role of Puck in "A Midsummer Night's Dream," one of Max Reinhardt's scouts noticed her and signed her to understudy Hermia in the Hollywood Bowl production of the same play. Then, Gloria Stuart, slated to play Hermia, was recalled by her studio for a picture, so little Olivia stepped into the role. When Warner Brothers decided to make the picture, she was assigned the same role. After that came "Alibi Ike," "The Irish in Us," and finally "Captain Blood" in which she scored a hit. A good type for costume roles, Olivia then went into "Anthony Adverse" and has since been working on "Charge of the Light Brigade," again with Errol Flynn. She is interested in painting, playing the piano, swimming and diving. Her favorite outdoor sports are horseback riding, tennis and badminton. Olivia is 5 feet 4 inches tall, weighs 107 pounds, has reddish brown hair and brown eyes. She is not married as yet. Write her at Warner Brothers Studios, Burbank, Calif.

FLORENCE GILL, Philadelphia, Pa.—As you have doubtless learned by now, Dolores Costello Barrymore played opposite George Raft in "Yours for the Asking." His next picture will probably be "Playboy," with Ida Lupino. Frances Farmer was born in Seattle, Wash.; Jean Arthur in New York City; Ricardo Cortez in Vienna, Austria; and Carole Lombard in Fort Wayne, Ind.

GENE AUTRY: This singing cowboy first saw the light of day in Tioga, Tex., on September 29, 1907. Starting his vocal career early in life, he sang in the choir of his grandfather's church. Gene worked on his father's ranch until he finished high school, "rode herd," and at 12, entered his first rodeo. At 14 he joined a travelling medicine show for a season, acquired a saxophone and traded it for a guitar. While in school in Ravia, Okla., he learned telegraphy at the railroad station where he worked after school hours, and at 18 became a full-fledged telegrapher on a lonely division of the San Francisco Railroad. There, to pass away the weary hours, he perfected his guitar technique and composed cowboy songs, later making good with them when he went on the radio in Tulsa in 1928. He made recordings for the Victor Company, had radio programs in New York and in Chicago as the "Cowboy Idol of the Air." After four years of radio work, Gene entered motion pictures in 1934, his first picture being "In Old Santa Fe," and his second, "The Phantom Empire." Mr. Autry is 5 feet 10 inches tall, weighs 165 pounds and is a natural athlete. He has reddish brown hair and brown eyes, and is married. "Oh, Susannah" is his most recent picture, and the next will be "Ride, Ranger, Ride." Under contract to Republic Studios, 4024 Radford Ave., North Hollywood, Calif., you may write him there.

KATHRYN SIMPSON, no address—The best way to obtain information about starting a fan club is to write directly to the star in whom you are interested. The player in question will also be glad to tell you which of his clubs you may conveniently join. Victor McLaglen was born in London, England, December 11, 1886. He made his first American movie in 1924, but had appeared in British productions previous to that. Cary Grant was born in Bristol, England, on January 18, and made his first picture in 1932. Franchot Tone was born in Niagara Falls, N. Y., on January 27, and appeared in his first film in 1933.

SHIRLEY TEMPLE: On April 23, 1929, Shirley Jane Temple made her original debut in Santa Monica, Calif. It was an auspicious day for her parents, Mr. and Mrs. George F. Temple. At the age of 3, during a dancing class, Shirley was spotted by a talent scout, who finally persuaded the fond parents to allow her to play in a series of Baby Burlesk Comedies. Next came "Frolics of Youth" and "War Babies," then "To the Last Man," with Randy Scott. In 1934 Fox started the talented baby on the way to fame by casting her in "Stand Up and Cheer." As a result of her excellent work she was signed to a long term contract and thereafter has appeared in the following: "Now I'll Tell," "Change of Heart," "Little Miss Marker," "Baby Take a Bow," "Now and Forever," "Bright Eyes," "The Little Colonel," "Our Little Girl," "Curly Top," "The Littlest Rebel," "Captain January," and "Poor Little Rich Girl." Her next will be "The Bowery Princess" and "The Stowaway" is tentatively scheduled as the one to follow it. It is perfectly obvious that Shirley's hair is blonde and curly, and that blue eyes go with it. She is studying under a tutor and pets are her only hobby at the moment. Of course she has lots of dolls. John and George, her two brothers, like to play with her and tease her—like all brothers. You may write her at 20th Century-Fox Studios, Box 900, Beverly Hills, Calif.

SELMA OSTROW, Philadelphia, Pa.—"Symphony of Six Million," featuring Ricardo Cortez and Irene Dunne, was first released April 20, 1932.

LARRY "BUSTER" CRABBE: February 7th is Clarence Linden Crabbe's birthday, and Oakland, Calif., was his birthplace. He attributes his giant physique to the fact that, when he was 2, his family moved to Honolulu where he learned to swim under tutelage of the natives, and practically lived on a diet of raw pineapple. There he also mastered the Hawaiian language and the art of ukulele and guitar playing. Larry came back from Hawaii when he was in the second year of college and graduated from the University of Southern California in 1932, having majored in political science and been active in campus dramatics. He paid his way through college by working in the stock room of a clothing store in the winter, and as a life guard in the summer. In between times he was a member of the U.S.C. swimming team and played football and basketball. Paramount sent for him to take tests for the role of the lion man in "King of the Jungle" because of his splendid build, but the first voice tests were unsatisfactory. After taking vocal lessons, however, he returned and got the part in 1933. Twice he represented the United States in the Olympic games, once in Amsterdam and again in Los Angeles. He at one time held five world swimming records, 35 national championships and numerous college honors. Larry is 6 feet 1 inch tall, weighs 188 pounds and has brown eyes and hair. His hobby, naturally enough, is swimming. Married to Adah Virginia Held, he became the father of a girl on July 16, 1936. He's very busy these days at Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon St., Hollywood, Calif., having recently completed "Lady Be Careful," "Stairs of Sand," and is now working on "The Rose Bowl."

E.M.D., Leadville, Colo.; EILEEN BROOKS, Woodridge, N. J.—Kenneth Howell played the role of John Jones, Jr., in "Educating Father." He is under contract to 20th Century-Fox Studios, Box 900, Beverly Hills, Calif., and will be in another Jones Family picture entitled "Back to Nature." Mr. Howell is 19 years old and is not married. You may be able to obtain his photograph by writing him at the above address and enclosing 25¢ in stamps or cash.

"I hate to show up all powdery in strong light"

THE test of a powder is strong light. And showing too much is one of the worst faults a powder can have, the vote among 1,067 girls proved.

Pond's got twice the vote of the next-liked powder, for "not giving that powdered look." Three times the vote of the third favorite.

"Glare-proof" colors, the reason. Pond's colors are "glare-proof"—catch only the softer rays of light—can't show up "powdery" in strongest light. A special ingredient makes Pond's soft, clinging. Two other ingredients make it stay fresh looking for hours.

Low prices. Decorated screw-top jars, 35¢, 70¢. New big boxes, 10¢, 20¢.

A TOUR OF TODAY'S TALKIES

By Leo Townsend

(Above) A scene from the latest Marion Davies opus, "Cain and Mabel." This time Clark Gable, minus the usual moustache, is her leading man.

If Westerns are your meat, "The Texas Rangers" will be just what the doctor ordered. Above, Jean Parker and Fred MacMurray in a love scene.

(Top) "Piccadilly Jim," with Bob Montgomery and Madge Evans is a real treat. And, above, one of the best musicals to come out of Hollywood in many a movie moon, "Sing, Baby, Sing." Alice Faye and Adolphe Menjou have top acting spots.

(Top) "Stage Struck" is very amusing fare with Dick Powell and Joan Blondell in co-starring roles. (Above) Sixteen-year-old Nova Pilbeam and Sir Cedric Hardwicke turn in superb characterizations in "Nine Days a Queen." It's an all-English cast.

★★★★ Nine Days a Queen (G-B)

When it comes to making epics of old England it is, logically enough, England rather than Hollywood which turns out the superior product. "Nine Days a Queen" is the best English picture since "The Private Life of Henry VIII," which means it is also better than any picture Hollywood has ever made dealing with the same general subject and era. For a specific example, compare this picture with "Mary of Scotland." Where Katharine Hepburn's "Mary" is strident and occasionally shot through with high school dramatics, young Nova Pilbeam's "Lady Jane Grey" is the quietly beautiful performance of an actress who understands her role and is equal to its demands. "Mary of Scotland" is a pageant, while "Nine Days a Queen" is a moving picture. It is the story, as you probably know, of Lady Jane Grey's unwilling ascendancy to the throne of England and of her tragic end, after a brief reign, at the hands of Mary Tudor. "Nine Days a Queen" is a completely adult film, which should be seen by everyone wanting to enjoy the best type of entertainment the screen has to offer. Nova Pilbeam is superb as the unhappy young queen, and there are excellent performances by Sir Cedric Hardwicke, Desmond Tester and John Mills.

Preview Postscript

This picture was the first foreign-made film ever given a world premiere in Hollywood. Almost all the prominent stars turned out to honor their British fellow-actors. And, of course, the British crowd in Hollywood, including Ronald Colman, Clive Brook, Elizabeth Allan, Sir Guy Standing and countless others, was there . . . Sixteen years old, Nova Pilbeam has been on the stage since the age of 12. She plays the piano, dances, sews and reads voraciously. She'd like to see Hollywood, but isn't in any hurry . . . Sir Cedric Hardwicke was knighted at the age of 42 for his remarkable contribution to British theatrical history. He was playing in "Tovaritch" in London at the same time this picture was being made, but was the only member of the picture's cast able to get to Hollywood for the premiere . . . The "discovery" of the picture was 16-year-old Desmond Tester. He's been on the stage for four years but this was his first film. He's totally unimpressed with his acting life, lives quietly with his mother outside of London and just "happened" into stage work after watching his sister rehearse in "The Merry Wives of Windsor" and was asked to fill in the part of "Robin." He's been acting without a let-up ever since.

★★★ Stage Struck (First National)

Here's a backstage musical that's smart enough to kid itself and thus take most of the curse off the routine "show must go on" type of thing. It also wisely substitutes good comedy for those tremendous Busby Berkeley numbers that once frightened us out of our seats. A good laugh or two is usually much easier on the nerves than the sight of 5,000 platinum cuties playing 5,000 platinum pianos, and we'll fight the man who says it isn't. In this one, Joan Blondell plays a gal who has gained considerable notoriety by the rather simple trick of shooting her husband. She buys herself a show and wants to star in it. Fortunately for the script writers and for Dick Powell, the show's dance director, she shoots another guy on the eve of the show's opening, all of which allows Jeanne (Continued on page 105)

GOOD NEWS

Our snoopy reporter finds love in bloom wherever he goes. It's all big time romance, what's more

Instead of rushing to the courts over the custody of their child, Joan Blondell and ex-hubby George Barnes have a much better idea. Joan has complete charge of young Norman Scott Barnes, and now that she's working in "Three Men on a Horse," at Warner Brothers, George visits the set every few days and gets a full report on the child's activities from the former Mrs. B.

When the Warner Baxters took that fishing trip to Canada, Frank McGrath, who is Warner's stand-in and good friend, went along. "Frank had to go along," said Warner. "He'd stand in the stream until he got a nibble, then I'd rush in and get the credit."

When Director E. H. Griffith needed ten white rabbits for a scene in "Ladies in Love" he bethought himself of the rabbits Shirley Temple keeps in the backyard of her studio bungalow. He phoned Shirley at her home and asked if a few could be borrowed. "Sure," said Shirley. "How much will you pay me?" Griffith offered a dollar, but he was turned down. "I want twenty dollars," announced the pride of the Temples, "and I won't take less than ten." They settled for fifteen, which seems high for rabbits—even if they're Shirley Temple's.

Now that the novelty of Bob Montgomery's English sports racer is wearing off, the eyes of the gapers in these parts try to focus on the very brilliant yellow number owned and operated by Robert Taylor. It's so low you climb steps to get up to the curb from it, and it's equipped with three dachshunds which ride in the front seat alongside Bob and his beret.

There's a big domestic war being conducted at this moment by Garbo and Rosalind Russell. Seems when the Sad-Eyed One returned from Sweden she found Hazel, her colored maid, had been lured away by Miss Russell and more money. Both gals are too fond of Hazel to give her up, and Hazel is in a state, to put it mildly.

The Penalty of Fame: After a recent visit to a doctor, Richard Dix received a huge bill for a papilloma treatment. Richard had visited the doctor for a mere corn removal, but a glance at the dictionary proved that papilloma is uptown, or Beverly Hills, for corns. Naturally, they come considerably higher.

Over on the "Camille" set at M-G-M everyone's talking about the "new" Garbo. It's the same old Miss G., of course, but the "new" is tacked on because The Great One is beginning to act like people. She has always been easy to work with and gracious to her co-stars, but now she is loosening up to the extent of smiling at the extras who encounter her. Which is something, for a Garbo smile is Swedish for laughing out loud.

Unlike some of the high-priced talent who consider it good taste to keep the cameraman and director waiting when everyone else is ready to shoot a scene, Garbo is probably the most punctual of all the stars when it comes shooting time. Bill Daniels, who photographs all the Garbo pictures, has a small horn dangling from his camera. When a scene is ready Daniels blows two sharp blasts on the horn, and out from her dressing-room rushes Garbo.

While we're on the subject of democratic stars, let's take the case of Gary Cooper. Any guy who makes $5,000 a week shouldn't even have to speak to himself, but it isn't that way with Mr. C. Following him down the boulevard on his way to work at Paramount recently, we noticed people recognizing Cooper and his elegant Dusenberg. Most of them waved, or shouted hello. Each of them received a Cooper wave or a Cooper hello in return. And we know stars who get no more than $4,500 a week who won't wave at all just to give the impression they're in the money.

And what studio recently bought 1500 tickets to one of its own premieres and gave them to the employees? The gesture was more practical than magnanimous, for the price of the tickets was amputated from the employees' pay checks.

If you have any doubts as to the popularity of young Mr. Robert Taylor you should have seen the crowd that mobbed him in front of a theatre following the preview of "His Brother's Wife." Mr. T., with Barbara Stanwyck, was completely hemmed in by admirers waving autograph books under his classic features. Such popularity must have surprised even his bosses, for the studio had scouts in front of the theatre during the preview tipping bystanders off that Bob and Barbara would soon be out, and hinting, in a nice way, that it would be fun to sort of rush up for an autograph.

Conversation in a Hollywood bar:
Gal: "I just saw Robert Taylor in 'His Brother's Wife' and, you know, even down in the jungle with his hair mussed he still looked nice. I think he's awfully cute, don't you?"
Guy: "I think I'll have another drink."

Three gals in print! Glenda Farrell, Mary Carlisle, Jean Harlow at Davies' party.

Two tennis fiends, above, Karen Morley and Paula Stone on their way to the Palos Verde courts near Karen's beach home. Karen's radiant smile is due probably to her screen return.

Above, two songsters, Mary McCormic and Marion Talley, are Mary Pickford's guests. Below, Irene Dunne seems to be warning Merwyn Le Roy of Cameraman Scotty's presence.

Bob Taylor may be the handsomest guy in town, but Jimmy Stewart is Hollywood's Number One beau. You see him with Ginger Rogers, Eleanor Powell and half a dozen other screen beauties all in the course of a couple of weeks. Last time we saw him was at Frances Langford's party. This time he came alone and spent most of his time listening to Frances sing a load of request numbers for her guests. When Frances became too hoarse to carry on Jimmy and Sid Silvers went to work on the dance routines they've learned for the new Eleanor Powell picture, "Born to Dance."

Monthly report on the possible Harlow-Powell merger: Jean and Bill dining together at the Victor Hugo and looking over some papers which turned out to be an architect's plans for a house. Since the Powells and the Harlows aren't in the real estate business, it must mean something, for Jean sold her house recently and Mr. P. disposed of the Powell homestead last month.

Item from the publicity department of Mr. Samuel Goldwyn, proving that True Love is always visible to the naked eye: "The first scene shot by Director H. C. (Hank) Potter on the new Samuel Goldwyn film 'Love Under Fire' was a love scene between Merle Oberon and David Niven. Potter was heard to remark on the fact that they 'almost seemed to live their parts'." A shrewd observation, H. C. (Hank).

The social leadership of the movie colony will probably soon be the private property of Norma Shearer and Irving Thalberg. At any rate, Mr. Thalberg has a secretary in his office who does nothing but make, accept and reject social engagements.

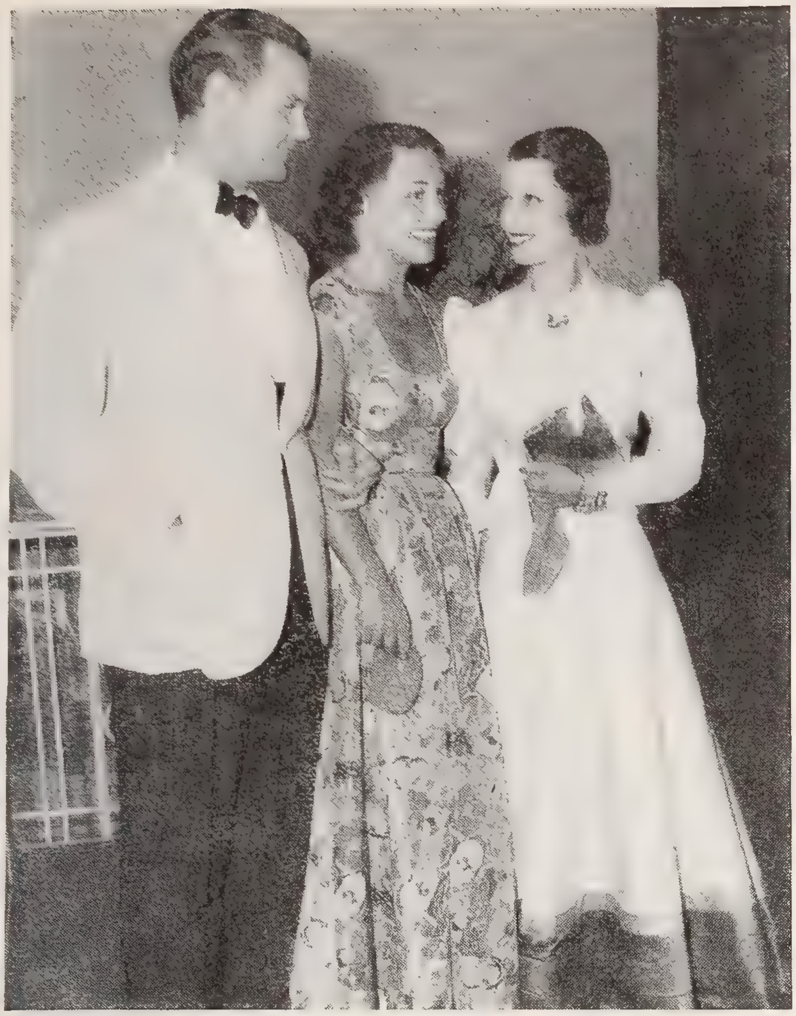
All is not sweetness and light in the Fred MacMurray household these days. The rift, however, is not between bride and groom, but their respective pets. Fred has a mongrel dog, Friday, while Mrs. M. has a Maltese cat—and both are working overtime on the "till death do us part" clause. But it looks like Friday has won out, for Lillian has written an aunt in Boston telling her to expect a slightly battered Maltese in the next mail.



Birds of a feather—an operatic trio meets at the Troc. Above, Lawrence Tibbett, Gladys Swarthout and Lily Pons. Below, Fredric and Florence March attend the Tallulah Bankhead opening.

Hollywood's latest romance of the younger set. Anne Shirley, beaming with joy, holds tightly to Owen Davis, Jr.'s arm as they attend the "Mary of Scotland" world premiere. Cute?

More fun on the "Ladies in Love" set, where Constance Bennett, Janet Gaynor, Loretta Young and Simone Simon are trying so hard to co-star and be big about it. The gals overwork their smiles on each other, and graciousness is so much the order of the day that one afternoon on the set four maids staggered in with trays, teapots and cups, and none of the little ladies knew which service to honor. Hereafter, they'll order their own. Title of the picture should really be more explanatory, like this: "Ladies in Love—but not with each other."

Cecil B. DeMille has once more donned his riding breeches and his puttees, which is Hollywood for saying he's making a picture. It's "The Plainsman," with Gary Cooper and Jean Arthur, who make a swell screen team. There was some talk of calling this one "The Plainsman Goes to Town," to cash in on their last effort, but either the idea or the guy who suggested it was dropped. What we started to say was that Mr. DeMille is always the best actor on a DeMille set. He's so good that Paramount studio guides always conduct visitors to "The Plainsman" set. Instead of watching the picture, everyone watches DeMille. Most amusing of all is the chap whose duty it is to follow Mr. DeM. about with a chair. When DeMille wants to sit down, he never has to look back to see what's available. There's something there, or else.

It may be sad news to learn that there'll be no gilded DeMille bathtubs in "The Plainsman." In fact, the only bath in the picture will be taken by a canary. It may be the new Hollywood economy, but we can remember back to those lush days of "Cleopatra," when Claudette Colbert bathed her way into stardom. But a canary, Mr. Hays!

While Sonja Henie, the skating star, awaits her first picture assignment she can be seen about town in her white limousine piloted by a white-liveried chauffeur and sporting a white wire-haired terrier. "Seen" is putting it mildly, for on a good clear day Sonja and her entourage are visible for miles. What's more, her home in Beverly Hills also carries out the white color scheme. And to further it, the white-haired boy of the moment is Cary Grant, even though Cary is still more than attentive to Mary Brian.

In case you didn't know it, the leader in the fan mail derby at the moment is Bob Taylor. Bob gets more letters than Clark Gable, which means he gets more than anybody. Besides being Mr. Farley's greatest asset, he seems to be playing leading man to all of Metro's most expensive ladies. Right now he's with Garbo in "Camille" and doing right well, but his first day on the set was a trying one. The thought of meeting Garbo was too much for him. Finally the introduction came. "How do you do?" said Garbo. Ten minutes later they were in a clinch for the picture. Who says Garbo's hard to know?

Rosalind Russell found out the meaning of success one afternoon when she was showing her sister Mary Jane the town, and vice versa. It was Mary Jane's first visit to Hollywood, so Rosalind packed her on a sight-seeing bus and the two of them listened to the driver point out all the sights, including the homes of the stars, and including Rosalind's home. "Just imagine," breathed Mary Jane, "how far you've come—you're even included in a bus route."

Child custody wars seem to have taken Hollywood by storm. Within the past few months Ann Harding, Mary Astor, Freddie Bartholomew and Edith Fellows have all gone to court to fight it out. Freddie was awarded to his aunt, and now Edith Fellows has just been handed over to her grandmother. All of which makes Jackie Cooper a highly unusual young actor. Don't let this get around, but Jackie actually lives with his mother!

Questions without Answers: What prominent and well-to-do screen and radio comedian of the imitation Will Rogers school lives in one of the cheapest apartments in Hollywood—not, as his publicity would have you believe, because he's "just folks," but because the thought of parting with an extra nickel horrifies him?

Three hours under the sun meant two weeks in bed for Jean Harlow. Taking what she thought was a rest at Catalina,

A merry foursome when all was gay at a recent party. Mary Brian, Cary Grant and the Errol Flynns, who now are planning a trip.

Miss H. fell asleep on the beach. When she awoke her mother had to charter a plane to rush her back to Hollywood and a hospital. The whole incident comes as a distinct shock to all of us loyal Harlow fans, for our thoughts on the comparative heat of Jean and the sun were quite the reverse of what, sad as it seems, are the facts.

Gregory Ratoff has a passion for learning things. On the "Sing, Baby, Sing" set he talked Adolphe Menjou into giving him French lessons. After a few weeks Ratoff's French was "ta-reefic" and Menjou's was ruined. He can't speak it any more without a Russian accent.

A high school gal was visiting her first movie set at Metro recently. The picture was "Love on the Run," and the stars were Clark Gable and Joan Crawford. Breathlessly she watched the famed pair go into a clinch. "Gee," she whispered, "I'd love to be in pictures." "Well, you are!" snapped the director. "That remark of yours is right on the sound track."

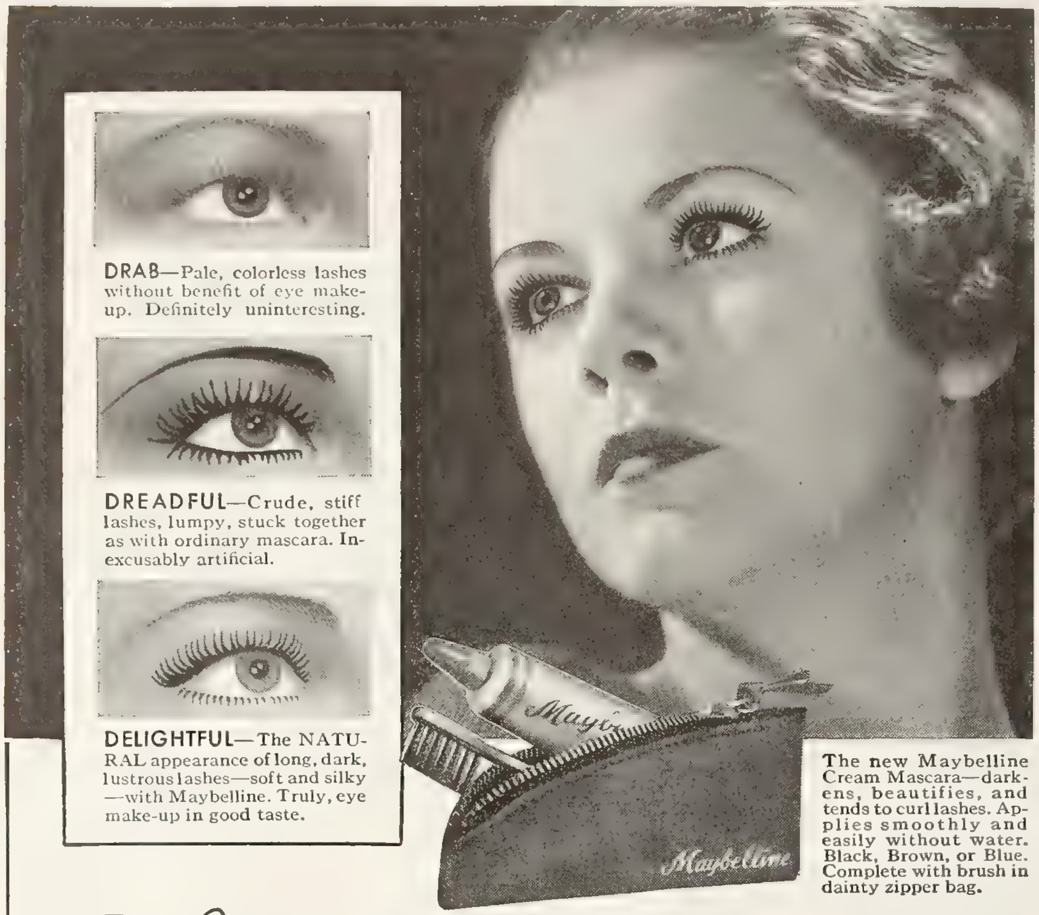
What Do People Say About Your Eyes?



DRAB—Pale, colorless lashes without benefit of eye make-up. Definitely uninteresting.

DREADFUL—Crude, stiff lashes, lumpy, stuck together as with ordinary mascara. Inexcusably artificial.

DELIGHTFUL—The NATURAL appearance of long, dark, lustrous lashes—soft and silky—with Maybelline. Truly, eye make-up in good taste.

ROCHELLE HUDSON

You wouldn't think that a young gal who can look as beguiling as this would be doomed to home-spun roles, but that is Rochelle's fate. And she becomes an increasingly good actress with each one. Now she is busy with the new Dionne Quins' picture "Reunion." Jean Hersholt is again the kindly doctor and Michael Whalen the heart interest.

and

Maybe Errol Flynn is a little fed up with colorful costumes, but he can't deny he doesn't look elegant in them. However, having finished "The Charge of the Light Brigade," he is making that best-selling novel, "Green Light," which puts him in modern garb for the first time. Anita Louise and Margaret Lindsay have the feminine leads in this with him.

MADGE EVANS

Madge could sit down and brood a bit over her screen career but, instead, she looks both beautiful and happy. One of the sweller young actresses in town, she has not yet gotten the real break she deserves. However, things seem to be looking up for her with a meaty part in "Piccadilly Jim," opposite Bob Montgomery, and a good one in "Pennies from Heaven," with Bing Crosby.

GENE RAYMOND

We suspect that this very sophisticated and searching expression on Mr. R's handsome face is mostly due to his fear that you fans sigh over his wavy blond hair and clean-cut good looks! As it happens, Gene is such a grand actor that he needn't worry. He has just finished "'Walking on Air" with Ann Sothern as his heart beat. As you know, Gene and Jeanette MacDonald are altar-bound.

BEVERLY ROBERTS

Meet one of cinematown's luckiest and most talented young gals. In one brief year of putting a special brand of personality into every small part given her, Beverly has stepped right up into the close-ups. In fact, she stepped right into the part left vacant by Bette Davis in "God's Country and the Woman." Beverly has vivacity and individuality. There's no doubt that she'll get places.

MERLE OBERON

It's been too long a wait for Merle's next picture, but you'll be doubly rewarded by "Love Under Fire." Not only does she have Brian Aherne as a leading man, but also David Niven. And since all you fans have followed their charming off-screen romance, this will be good news. It gives David one of the best breaks of his recently-begun screen career.

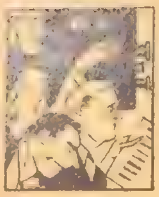
HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM



MRS. ARTHUR HORNBLOW, JR. (Myrna Loy, to you) took her famous titian locks from under the drier long enough to shout at me, "I'm starving! Just a few more minutes of this and we'll dash out and have some lunch."

"Brides aren't supposed to be hungry!" I shouted back.

"Well, this one is!" and she ducked back under the drier. She hummed. It blended oddly with the whir of the electric machine above her head but she wasn't listening. Her eyes were smiling. There was a half smile on her lips. Her feet tapped out minute dance steps as she sat there. One doesn't have to add that Myrna Loy Hornblow was happy!

She was wearing a tailored maroon dressing robe with silk initials embroidered on the pocket.

"IT OUGHT to be pink and traily," I reminded her. She wrinkled up her altogether delightful young nose at me. "I haven't even got a trousseau. At least not much of one."

That's Myrna for you. Direct and to the point without fuss or frills. And the point, in this case, was getting married. She did it in the simple, unexploited way she does everything else. One Saturday morning, June twenty-seventh to be exact, she motored down to Old Mexico with Arthur Hornblow. They took along only two witnesses, Shirley Hughes, who is Myrna's stand-in and closest friend, and Ray Ramsey, a co-worker out at the M-G-M studios.

"We chose Ensenada for the ceremony because it's such a sleepy, quaint little town—as far removed from the hurry and confusion of Hollywood as anything you can imagine," Myrna said. "Even the cockatoos forget to chatter at times!"

There was none of the emotional tenseness about it that characterizes most weddings. Instead, there was a feeling of deep serenity and a happiness that was almost tangible. Myrna wore a high-neck dress that buttoned up the back, of beige crepe patterned with hand-blocked flowers. Her accessories were of brown patent leather and her hat of brown taffeta. She might have been a young lady going to a tea—for Myrna never dramatizes any episode of her private life. Her bouquet, for instance. In place of the regulation gardenias or orchids she carried a garden bouquet—asters, sweet william, larkspur. They blended with the print of her dress, making a fascinating picture.

There's a charming inn at Ensenada that fronts a palm-bordered strip of beach. A perfect place to slip away for a honeymoon. But the young Hornblows didn't "slip away" from their friends entirely. Not from Doug Fairbanks, Sr. at any rate.

The first intimation they had that something special was going on was when a Mexican quartet began serenading them. Then they were asked to "step dees way plez" into a private dining-room. And there was Fairbanks with his bride, the former Lady Ashley, the Countess of Warwick and Billy Fiske III—all ready to celebrate with a nuptial banquet! They had flown down from Los Angeles that afternoon in a cloud clipper that Doug chartered. Not a thing was missing at the banquet; the wedding cake was four tiers high and surmounted by a replica of Myrna done in candy. From the balcony, the quartet sang sweet old Spanish wedding songs.

THE FOLLOWING Wednesday Myrna and Arthur motored up to Frank Vanderlip's estate in Palos Verdes, Vanderlip and Hornblow being friends of long standing. The whole place was turned over to them to continue their brief honeymoon.

"I was married, you see, between 'To Mary—With Love' and 'Libeled Lady,' explained Myrna. "And there simply wasn't time for a trip. When 'Libeled Lady' is completed we may have a chance to go to Honolulu. That is, if Arthur's schedule permits it." (He's Paramount's star producer, you know.)

Mrs. Hornblow's titian locks were dry now. She'd whisked into a little print frock and the starving bride and I headed for a Brown Derby lunch.

"Our new house is almost completed—out in Hidden Valley, you know. It's really a darling."

"What kind of darling?" I prompted.

It's a provincial farmhouse. Not large I assure you! You should have seen

You'll be amused when you discover one of the reasons why Shirley Temple and Bill Robinson are such good friends.

HE GAVE her a bracelet. She gave him a watch. He gave her an automobile.

And Hollywood did not snicker. Hollywood did not raise its superior eyebrows and say, "Well, how long will this last?" Instead, Hollywood knows that, for once, there was born in the studios a friendship rare and beautiful, that of Bill Robinson and Shirley Temple.

It began the very first day Bill Robinson arrived on the Twentieth-Century Fox lot. Shirley Temple ran over to the editor of this magazine, who happened to be visiting the studio.

"Mr. Robinson is here!" Shirley announced, breathless with excitement. "Over there," she added, nodding that curley head of hers towards a group of men who stood chatting in one corner of the mammoth stage.

"There! See!" she said, taking the editor's hand, and using most of her will power to refrain from pointing. For Shirley has been brought up well. She has been taught that ladies do not point. And Shirley learns all her lessons thoroughly.

"Mr. Robinson?" queried the editor. "Which one?"

"The dark one," politely explained Shirley. "And," she whispered, confidentially, "he eats ice cream every day! He told me."

"I should think that would make him very sick," commented the editor with that self-righteous feeling editors usually have.

"Oh, no! No, it doesn't!" said Shirley, vigorously shaking the curls, and evidently annoyed, but making up her mind to stick up for the glories of ice cream, no matter what the cost.

She had been taught to respect the opinions of her elders, and here was a case where elders plainly disagreed; opinions were divided, so why not follow the most pleasant one. Anyway, hadn't her brand-new friend just assured her that ice cream never hurt him.

"Not one bit," said Shirley. "Not one teeny-weeny bit," and for emphasis she held (Continued on page 91)

"Shirley Temple is not merely a child prodigy. She will become one of the greatest actresses in the world," predicts Bill Robinson.

Money has little to do with any of Jimmy Cagney's rebellions. But no one else would have taken the chance he took to achieve his goal.

Mrs. Cagney knows that if Hollywood ever fails her Jimmy, there are plenty of other roads he can travel.

Here's a star who acts as he

By Julia Shawell

SOMEWHERE in the amazing melange of scenic effects and widely assorted impressions of "movie star" Cagney, there ought to be found the real Jimmy who has been called everything from a soapbox insurgent with the banner of "A Cause" slung over his left shoulder to "Hollywood's Bad Boy," giving free and foolish vent to his waggish tendencies.

Yet, none of these highly imaginative, often distorted presentations fits the actual figure of the sandy-haired, keen-eyed little guy whose story reads like the success fiction he utterly disdains.

The answer to conundrum Cagney is no mystery unsolved, no secret which will never be divulged. It's all—what he has done, how he acts, what he'll do as long as he's here—found in his elemental, uncomplicated philosophy of living and bound up in the simple statement, "I've got to act like I feel."

Whether what he feels is right has nothing to do with a true analysis of Jimmy Cagney. Every controversy has two sides—certainly those opposed to Cagney consider themselves aggrieved. But even his bitter enemies must go into battle with this realist armed against their own deep-rooted respect for the undeviating course of a Cagney righteousness. And it may be that some of the less crusading members of his own craft look with an almost hopeless envy on his unfaltering daring.

For a Cagney, there is no such thing as today's ex-

CAGNEY TELLS JIMMY'S STORY

Yes, it's been a long time since you've seen Mr. Cagney on the screen. "Ceiling Zero," with June Travis, was his last film for Warners before the court to-do. All's well now, though, for he's signed with Grand National.

feels, can't be swayed and won't compromise on his stand pediency with a half-hearted promise of a tomorrow's justification. Probably because his screen career has been a succession of parts in which grapefruit squishing, leaden pineapple throwing, sock the ladies and wrong-side-of-the-railroad-tracks characterizations have been his meat, there has been a romantic tendency to present the real James Cagney as a quiet little fellow who likes to play the piano in his own home and putter around with his art. Neither the screen roles nor the carefully fostered personality stories have done right by Jimmy.

He's no sleight-of-hand artist with a card up his sleeve in the big game. Rather, he gives you the impression of a player with four aces in his hand, ranged alongside the joker; and yet, you have the feeling he'd stay right on with a pair of deuces. If he seems to be one of those long-shot reckless gamblers of whom more timid souls breathlessly ask, "Aren't you taking an awful chance?" you know he'll play his hunches and take the consequences.

Money has little to do with any of his rebellions excepting that it represents, in a material way, the other things on which he takes a defensive attitude.

"Any able-bodied man can always get a day's work," he told me, as he contemptuously dismissed the more compromising gentlemen among his acting contemporaries. In his interviews he is as definite and thought-revealing as he is sure-footed on the path which he believes to be the Cagney destiny. He'll dodge questioners for months and then, when he decides to talk, you'll get answers to all your questions. Sometimes the answers are so startling that it's the interviewer who necessarily must adopt a protective measure of reservation. There is seldom such a thing as an "off-the-record" statement with Cagney. If he's willing to talk at (Continued on page 78)

Bing Crosby's and Joan Bennett's mates can take credit for starting them on the success road.

Love's BEEN

SINCE THE movies seem to have provided us with some of the most fascinating case histories of love's inspiration, we're going to present example after example. If it's true that the proof of the pudding is in the eating, here's a whole pudding full of case histories of players who have climbed to new heights, in many instances have been completely rehabilitated, by the inspiration of love.

Case history number one is Jean Arthur. Like doctors we choose the most convincing case first, and there can be no doubt but that love found Jean Arthur discouraged and in comparative obscurity, only to lift her back to her original height in the movies, and send her to a stardom she had thought she would never achieve.

It took the love of Frank Ross to convince Jean that she was an A-1 actress; that she had but to bide her time and the world would know, as he did, that she was deserving of success. In his own quiet fashion he encouraged her to leave Hollywood when the ways of the cinema began to break her morale. He encouraged her to try the stage again, although it meant long separations and a break in the pleasant routine of living they had achieved.

WHEN SHE was discouraged by being typed as a leading lady for comedies, he convinced her that it was a passing phase in her work. When she got a chance to play dramatic parts on the New York stage, he rounded up the criticisms as they appeared and made a big fuss about the favorable comments on Jean's acting. He wasn't taking any chances that she might slide back into the morass of discouragement again.

He's been the best sport in the world, too, about her new chance at Hollywood, because it means a great separation—he is in New York and his wife's in California. When you're in love a separation can be a painful, unhappy experience. But when you're really in love you make sacrifices, and that's what Frank Ross, Jr., has never balked at doing for Jean.

In all the fuss that has been made about the transformation of "the littlest of the Bennett sisters," the main source of inspiration seems to have been shunted to the background—if one might say that Gene Markey could ever be shunted to any background. It is to her writer-husband, Gene Markey, that Joan owes her success.

When Dan Cupid's arrow hit these Hollywood boys and Dick Powell seems to be responsible for the noticeable, happy change in Joan Blondell.

George Raft's whole personality has been transformed — all because of one girl.

THEIR INSPIRATION

By Hester G. Robison

UNTIL she married sophisticated, brilliant Gene, Joan was a wide-eyed ingenue just learning the rudiments of emotional portrayals. She had had a difficult life, although young, but she really did not know much about the rest of the world. She hadn't read enough, she hadn't seen enough to know about the depth of people's feelings.

Along came Gene, a man who has done a prodigious amount of living and thinking and reading about the rest of the world. His is a profound mind, a sensitive, serious outlook. He married the youngest Bennett and then began her transformation.

It was only natural that association with Gene should teach Joan a new understanding of people, of life. From little girl-mannerisms she turned to those of maturity. She acquired a broader outlook, a maturer way of thinking. It began to show in her lovely face.

Being the wife of a brilliant young author meant a new responsibility; responsibility for his happiness and contentment, so necessary to his work. It changed her from a child into a woman; from an ingenue into a dramatic star. To some he might have proved a subordinating influence. But not to Joan. She had a serious-minded, critical husband to please, and she valued his opinion of her work. The result is obvious in her pictures.

Before George Raft met Virginia Pine, epitome of social smartness and sophistication, he was a "slick guy," a "Broadway smart guy" in the fullest sense of the term. He couldn't quite shake off, even in his picture characterizations, the mannerisms of the boy from Tenth Avenue and Forty-First Street.

Look at him today. In person or on the screen Raft has a polish, a natural poise that is real and not an affected smart aleckness. Virginia Pine is "society" and somehow she managed to inspire George with an appreciation of smooth manners, good behavior and appearance. Today Raft can play a song-and-dance man or a social man-bout-town with equal ease.

HE GETS AWAY

On-screen and off-screen, they're filmdom's newest romantic twosome—Eleanor Powell and James Stewart. Below, a scene from "Born to Dance" with Sid Silvers, Una Merkel and Jim.

HE GETS away with murder!" That's what the envious, here in Hollywood, say of James Stewart. "What's he got?" they ask.

He's tall and lean and gangling. His hair won't stay brushed. He is not handsome; certainly not if you judge by the profile standards, though he is handsomer off the screen than he is on. Nice, tanned skin. Dark hair, even though unbrushed. White, strong teeth. Expressive hands. A sense of humor which twists his mouth amusingly and lurks, lazily, in his deep blue eyes.

He's taller and some forty pounds lighter than Clark Gable. And he's doing his darndest to "eat on some weight." He talks slowly, almost drawlingly, and in a very low-toned, Pennsylvania Dutch voice. He wears good-looking clothes, which you might not expect. He wears them carelessly.

But he hasn't the extreme good looks of Robert Taylor nor the exotic appeal of a Valentino nor the smoothness of the English actors.

You can't compare him with anyone, past or present. He can't be "typed" because he has no prototype. He has a certain awkwardness. And yet the girls sigh and say "He's won-der-ful!"

I asked a young and pretty girl what it is he has. She said, "He promises tenderness with strength underneath. He isn't obviously any one thing. It's just that he seems to promise—everything."

HE IS BLACK and blue from pinching himself to find out whether he is awake or dreaming. He doesn't believe any of it. He doesn't believe that he is here in Hollywood, a "moom pitcher" actor. When Gable and Norma Shearer and Bob Montgomery and others hail him in friendly fashion he forgets to return their greetings. He thinks they must be talking to someone else or he has a dreamy feeling that he is still seeing their shadows on the screen.

When he was on location with Jeanette MacDonald and Nelson Eddy in "Rose Marie," he used to play the accordion for them evenings and he'd say to himself, 'Hey, this can't be you, James!'

When he has dates, as he does, with Eleanor Powell, Ginger Rogers, Virginia Bruce, Janet Gaynor, this girl or that, he is sure he is getting by with murder.

When he looks at himself on the screen and thinks of all the idols of the past, and now Gable and Taylor, he wonders how soon he is going to wake up to find himself back in New York, on the stage, where close-ups are not and faces don't matter so much.

WITH MURDER!

Here's why James Stewart hasn't yet been caught up with—and our guess is his luck will last indefinitely

By Gladys Hall

When the Great God Studio tells him (at it does) that in another year he'll be the biggest box-office sensation of the annum he has to pinch himself harder than ever to convince himself that he's hearing right. He doesn't believe a word of it. It's probably just as well for him that he doesn't. That's why, after some eight months or so, he's managing to keep the refreshing naturalness, the sort of blundering wonder of it all, with which he came.

Not believing a word of it, he works with all he's got in him. He tries and keeps on trying so that he can make himself believe he's really in Hollywood and really working, and not a disembodied spirit living in a dream.

"I poke around and try to find out about everything. I go into the prop room, the cutting room, the testing department, the casting office and learn all the ropes and red tape. I talk to the script writers. I watch the different directors and compare their methods and their results. I study up on projection machines, cameras and process shots. I want to know all there is to know about the business that finally projects me, an unbelieving shadow, onto the screen.

IT'S GOOD for me, too. I'm not so apt to begin to think I'm such big pumpkins in this racket if I know something about the mechanics back of it, the skilled, mechanical science which is really as important, if not more so, than the actor doing his stuff. After all, you can always substitute one actor for another and get along all right. You can't keep on substituting one camera for another or discard the sound track because it acts temperamental.

"I don't know," said Jimmy, "I swear I don't know how movie actors ever manage to get superiority complexes, swelled heads about themselves. If they use their eyes and ears a bit, if they realize how much goes into the making of a picture before they ever step onto a set, I should think they'd have to fight off inferiority complexes. One day's tour of the studio put me in my place and I think I'll stay put. We all get by with murder, more or less.

"Of course," said Jimmy, in that slow, low laconic voice of his, "of course, I always got by with murder, in a way. I was born in Indiana, Pennsylvania, you know. I don't know what that has to do with getting by with murder except that I might have been born in a New York slum, you know, and then I would have been called upon to do something about it. Anyway, I was the only son between two sisters. They didn't spoil me, I don't mean that. They believed that to spare the rod is indeed to spoil the child. They didn't spare it. But, after all, ask any fellow who has had two sisters. . . ."

Jimmy used to run away from home when he was a youngster. He had an "itch in my feet to see the world." He still has that itch. He still (Continued on page 80)

Loretta Young still retains many of her simple, unassuming, "Gretchen" characteristics.

HAND-

HAVE YOU ever had to wear cast-off, mended clothes, carry cast-off accessories? Have you ever had to take your turn at the end of the family line for anything and everything, even beaux? Have you known what it is to be "little sister"—especially to a beautiful, charming, gracious and favorite big one? If you have then you will be able to sympathize with Gretchen. And you'll laugh, cry, worry, fret and dream along with Gretchen (Loretta) Young in her hand-me-down experiences. Perhaps you will also gain courage and hope from her.

It may be hard to realize that Loretta Young, the poised, independent, responsible head of the House of Young today, was, only yesterday, its patronized, third-ranking child, its most affectionate but ineffectual Gretch! Still that was, ironically, the case. From the beginning, Gretchen had a complex about her older sisters. Admiring Polly Ann's graciousness and Sally's charm she would often say: "Oh, I just wish I had something!" She loved them, of course, and because she loved them so much and considered them so perfect, her yearning was doubly poignant.

By the hour she would sit around cross-legged on the floor, watching them while they dressed, while they fussed with their hair, listening to their talk about that gay outer world which she felt she would never know. She hung adoringly on every gesture, every word, every look. She tried to imagine what Polly Ann's dress would look like when it finally got around to her two years later. She wondered, too, if Sally would teach her to do her hair like she did hers, with the fan puffs at the side, when she grew old enough to put up her curls. She wondered, dreamily, if either of them would ever let her go out with Eric or Jimmie

"Ramona," with Loretta Young and Don Ameche in leading roles, is 20th Century-Fox's contribution to technicolor.

. . . if Eric or Jimmie ever asked her, of course. She wondered—but then her reveries were broken by her mother's frantic cries from the kitchen, "Gretchen, hurry up! I'm ready to go to the store now. I want you to help me carry things home."

Walking along the street, Gretchen would think: "It's humiliating always to be just a tag-along. But that's the way I started out. That's the way I'll end up, I guess."

YOU SEE she had so often heard the story of her first hopeless venture out into the world, at the slender age of two and a half, that she couldn't help thinking of it as prophetic. That story, in Mrs. Young's words, goes like this, "Polly Ann and Sally had been invited to a little girl's party, and I was to take them. Gretchen was not to go, of course—she was too little. So I put her to bed first, for her afternoon nap, and then got the other girls ready. We started out an hour later, and had to walk three blocks to the street car.

"Now I was sure that Gretchen had been asleep when we left, but as we boarded the car I heard a small voice calling from half a block behind us 'Wait for me. Wait! I'm going, too, Mama!' And there was Gretchen in her Peter Rabbit sleeping pajamas toddling after us! Well, there was only one thing I could do and that was to get off the car with the girls and take Gretchen back home, and spank her! Naturally, that made us late for the party. Polly Ann and Sally missed their ice cream and cake and it was months before they ever forgave her."

Something happened when Gretchen was four which almost, but not quite, put an end to her tag-along state. At that time the family moved from Salt Lake City to Hollywood where an aunt, Mrs. Traxler, was working at Paramount. One day at the studio they were testing a number of little girls for a role in the film starring Fanny Ward. None of them was suitable and Director George Melford turned to Mrs. Traxler and said, "You've mentioned your little nieces; bring one over. One about four." Mrs. Traxler dashed to the Young home, found a mud-spattered Gretchen in the back yard, whisked her off to the studio for a test, and mud and all—she won the part. Later, Theodore Roberts, who was also playing in the picture, walked over to Mrs. Young and asked, "Is this your little girl? Well, my dear, you have a genius on your hands."

MRS. YOUNG thought so, too, after seeing the rushes. But when the picture finally came out she had to look hard to see Gretchen—that settled it. A director should know. (Of course, what Mrs. Young didn't know then is that those things happen to the best of actors.) Gretchen was called out of the running right then and there, and sent to a convent to be educated.

So at four she came close to being the main support of the family, as she is today—but a few feet of film on the cutting room floor defeated her.

At the convent she dropped back again into her old role. In the four years that she spent there she was never to know what it was to have a new dress (one that hadn't been handed down from her sisters), she was never to cease hearing about her adorable older (Continued on page 95)

"I don't mean," Stu was saying, "that women get in my hair, exactly—not like they might in Gable's or Bob Taylor's or Gary Cooper's. I mean they're trouble because they're competition.

"I'm about," said Stu, "to become a renegade from my own sex. What I'm about to say is rank heresy, I know. My fellow men will never forgive me. It's this: I'm one who believes that women are smarter than men. Better brains. Quicker instincts. More common sense. Less sentimentality which reduces many a strong man to the sending of lace paper valentines when he ought to be on the field of battle, some kind of a battle. They're better actors, too, and I don't mean only on stage or screen. They've got us beat, that's why they're trouble.

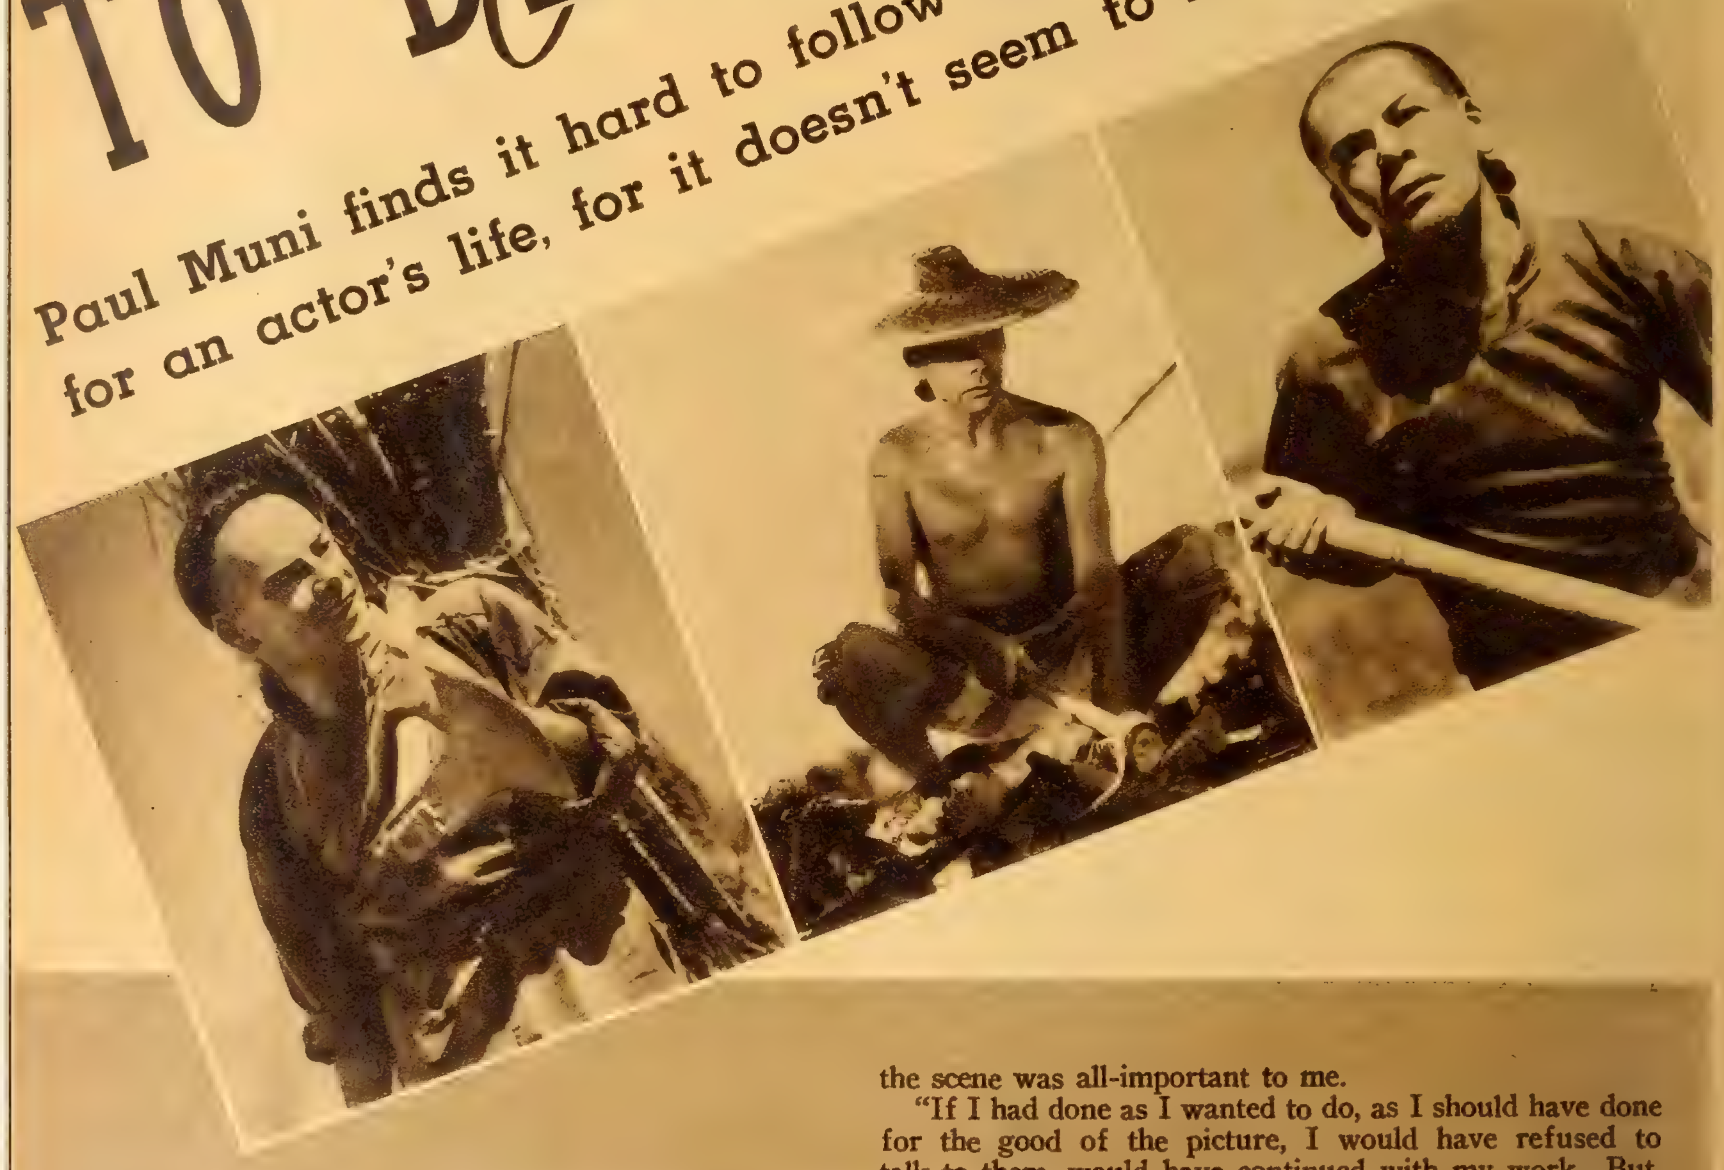
THEY CALL her foolish, but in her madness is a strange kind of sanity, A sanity which perhaps seems like madness, because she is only twenty, and few people at twenty have the call-a-spade-a-spade viewpoint of life that she has. I'll admit that as one to be interviewed she is a problem. The statements which she makes so calmly in the course of mere conversation, on paper, smack blatantly of an attempt to be startling.

SUCH STATEMENTS AS: "To the devil with this profession. I want to be a musician. Composing is the thing that gives me the greatest thrill. Acting in pictures is a gamble. I'll take it; I am taking it now, but I take it with my eyes open. I know everything depends on the breaks I get. The parts. If they give me good parts, I'll be good in them; if they give me bad ones, I haven't a chance. I want something to fall back on. My music is going to be that something. I have just written a song for Nino Martini. I have six more songs which have already attracted offers from publishers. I also have a book of poems to finish to complete the collection and then it will be published, too. These are the things that are important to me. As a writer and composer I can grow and grow. As an actress I can only grow if, and when, producers let me!"

AGAIN, TO further amaze and baffle one she says, "I don't kid myself. I haven't any real friends. There isn't a soul in this town, outside of my own family and Louis Hayward (who at this moment happens to think that he adores me), who would lift a finger to help me. I know that. I also know that it's quite possible that I'm not liked around here. As a matter of fact, I have made it a point to find out what people say and think about me. They don't know anything about me really, because I stick so close to home, because I'm by myself so much, so they make up lovely fantastic lies. I hear that I am a sex-appealist de luxe, that men are my meat, that I'm wild as a native from Fiji. It's all a lie; there's nothing to it. Half the nights I spend working at the piano, sometimes with Harry Mann, who is doing my arrangements, most often alone. But the light burns on up here in my house on the hill, so they figure it must be burning at both ends. If the reputation of an actress rests on such little things, then I say it's not worth while being an actress. There's too little inner (Continued on page 88)

Afraid TO BE HIMSELF

Paul Muni finds it hard to follow Hollywood's pattern for an actor's life, for it doesn't seem to fit him at all



WE'RE ALL cowards in Hollywood," Paul Muni told me. "We're afraid to be ourselves, afraid that we will be called temperamental, 'high hat,' difficult. We follow the Hollywood pattern because we haven't the courage to do otherwise.

"For instance, yesterday we were filming one of the most important scenes in the picture. Naturally, I was very anxious to do the scene well. I was sitting quietly in a corner, studying, when several important visitors came on the set. Under different circumstances I should have been very happy to meet them but, at that moment, the scene was all-important to me.

"If I had done as I wanted to do, as I should have done for the good of the picture, I would have refused to talk to them, would have continued with my work. But, had I done that, you know what the result would have been. Eyes would have stared at me in disgusted surprise. Voices, dozens of voices, would have spread the news that Muni was getting temperamental, going 'high hat,' becoming difficult.

"Only one person in all Hollywood has the courage to be herself, to do as she thinks best for her own good and for the good of her pictures. That person is Greta Garbo. I envy her moral stamina. I wish that I had one-tenth of it. I try to live my life as much as possible in the way I wish to live it, but I haven't the courage to Muni has been called "high hat" because he seeks seclusion so that he can conserve his energies for the fine characterizations he gives the screen. The parade of pictures above, shows you how completely he has become Wang in "The Good Earth." Luise Rainer and Muni in a tragic moment, above right. do it as completely as I would like to do it."

We were sitting on canvas camp chairs, Paul Muni and I, in a rolling field of young wheat. On all sides we were surrounded by shabby, slant-eyed Chinamen, thatched huts, nondescript dogs, patient water buffalo, cameras, microphones and thoroughly American technicians who yelled at each other through an intricate loud speaker system which reached to the farthest California hill, terraced in Chinese fashion and dotted with crude, unfamiliar shrines.

It was a slice of China brought to the San Fernando Valley, near Hollywood, for the making of "The Good Earth." The slim, young Chinaman on the opposite chair looked at me with dark eyes which belonged to Wang, Pearl Buck's struggling young farmer, and also to "Louis Pasteur" and to the "Fugitive from a Chain Gang" and to Paul Muni, himself.

I had been a little worried about my meeting with Muni. I had heard so many stories about his elusiveness, his detachment from the Hollywood scene, his hermit-like silence. But he surprised me. Instead of the silent, taciturn man whom I had expected, I found a young, talkative and quietly enthusiastic person, dressed in the soiled and worn garments of a poverty-stricken Chinaman.

"I try to be selfish—deliberately, consciously selfish," he said. "The stories you have heard about me are partly true. Only, I haven't the courage to carry my selfishness, if you can call it that, to the final completeness. I know that you must be selfish to be (Continued on page 85)

Here's Simone Simon, a

INTO THE exquisitely modelled five feet three, one hundred and fourteen pounds which is Simone Simon every strand of life has been twisted into one bright, confusing skein, so that temper and sweetness, tantrum and melting tolerance, cruelty and charity, bitterness and appeal alternate in rapid and confusion-making succession.

You think that you have a pretty petulant child on your hands and that all you need do is produce a lollipop and all will be well. And then, just as you are in the act of producing the lollipop, you meet the eyes of a wise and worldly woman—eyes which are cynical and perceptive and more than a little mocking. And no sooner have you tried to adjust yourself to this somewhat disconcerting mondaine than peals of outrageous laughter will startle you into the conviction that you are talking to a gay, mischievous young girl, who finds life and you, and mostly herself, deliriously amusing.

You assume, knowing something of her birth and upbringing, that she has spent her young life moving with millionaires, magnates and royalty, leaving their scalps on her slender belts. But then she says, almost harshly and with stark simplicity, "I didn't know any young people at home—abroad. First I am too young. And then I am too hard-working." So you do another mental revision and come up for air yet again.

You assume that she is a pampered young Continental of laces and pearls, facials and beauty patches until she holds up small but totally unmanicured hands and says, "I hate to fuss with me. I can use my hands. I detest the beauty parlors. I would not have the facials and those inquisition things they call the permanent waves—when they are not permanent at all," laughed Simone. When she laughs she really laughs—not a giggle—not one laugh but peals of laughter ringing out like bells.

She was known as one of the best-dressed women in Europe. She arrived in America with twenty trunks crammed to the lids with exclusive models and the latest chapeaux from Paris. She says, with impatience, "I don't know why. I felt like buying them at the moment. So I buy them."

CHILD OF DESTINY

By Faith Service

She never wears slacks around town or around the studio. She never wears sweaters, shorts or play suits. She is forever putting on gloves. Was it Beau Brummel who said that a woman should always wear gloves because when a woman takes off her gloves, she divests herself of half her charm? If he didn't, he probably wishes he had. Simone seldom divests herself of her gloves.

Her name, by the way, is pronounced Sea-moan Sea-Moan. It is her real name. Her mother liked the name Simone and thought she might as well use it twice. Why not? She knew of no other name she liked better.

SHE was born in Marseilles, that cross-roads where all the world meets in riotous color and adventure. Perhaps it was in Marseilles that the small Simone was laced with all the multi-colored strands which weave her wiles now.

Simone can be an angel but she gets perverse glee in being the opposite. But, 'tis said, that on the set of "Ladies in Love" great courtesy was rife among the leads, Loretta Young, Janet Gaynor, Constance Bennett and Simone.

From Marseilles, Simone sailed with her mother to Madagascar. And with only one eye on her school books, she absorbed with the other the teeming tropical life, the myriad races meeting and mingling. Perhaps it was Madagascar that bequeathed to Simone her legacy of many and multi-colored moods.

And then later in Budapest, in Paris, in Berlin, in Turin—in a dozen different cities and in a dozen different schools, the small Simone applied to her own exquisitely fashioned young person a delicate veneer of sophistication which made of her, at sixteen, a woman of the world with wiles at her finger-tips and wisdom in her sapphire blue eyes.

I talked with her after she had made some portraits and stills in the gallery at the Twentieth Century-Fox studio. She sang snatches of songs very loudly, and hilariously between the clicks of the camera. She jested with the photographer. She struck ridiculous attitudes, which were like daring French posters only more so. She told another actress, who had come into the studio on some errand to "walk away from here and sit over there, please." I had been told that I might find her "difficult," that she might walk out on me, lay me low if I asked her stupid questions. Maybe it was my good fortune that I talked to her after the preview of "Girls' Dormitory" and not before; that I talked to her during the making of "Ladies in Love," which a wise little birdie tells me she is "stealing" even as she stole 'Girls' Dormitory" and gambolled off with it. She looked, that day, like the kitten that has eaten the canary. She looked as though she had "stolen" something and was a rascally Raffles who loved it. She was brashly proud and unashamed of her pride. She called to me, "I am of a good disposition today. My nature feels good. I am so (Continued on page 76)

AN OUNCE OF PREVENTION

Don't think for a moment that these beauteous girls, Olivia de Havilland, above, and Simone Simon, below, don't realize that they won't be slim forever. What precautions are they taking?

Some do's and don'ts to keep you thin if you've attained slimness, and hints for you who find the pounds sneaking up in spite of everything you do to stop them

By Mary Marshall

Who wouldn't give her right arm for a figure like Anita Louise's? It's no cinch keeping it either.

Little Jean Parker's grace and poise is something for which to strive.

THEY SAY it's worth a pound of cure—which last is our text for next month, in case things have reached such a pass in your life that an ounce of prevention won't do you any good. That doesn't let you off reading this article, however, for there are a couple of hints here which will—I hope—be of benefit to you.

I made no bones about the fact that this article is to be concerned chiefly with the debutantes—the young girls whose figures and faces are good, fair, or simply swell. And with the young girls, also, whose figures and faces may not be good at all, but where the fault comes not through self-indulgence and neglect, but through difficulty in overcoming adolescent troubles.

First, the young miss with the pretty good or darn good appearance. To her, life is rosy indeed and she looks with superiority and pity on other poor mortals who must diet and exercise and deny themselves this and that. Thank goodness, thinks she, I need not do such penance. If she'll deign to listen, I'd like to give her some advice. Like this: keep your figure as lovely as it is, sister. Keep your complexion and the fine, clean contour of your face. Give thought for the morrow.

When I was a young thing, I envied tremendously two or three girls of my age and acquaintance who could, apparently, eat as much as and whatever they pleased and never gain an ounce or suffer in any other way. I had to watch my diet and I thought it pretty mean that these others could tuck away untold sundaes and confectioner's magoo and never divulge a bulge. At the present writing, two of these belles are very portly indeed. The other is nibbling cautiously at carrots and lettuce in an effort not to get any more portly. And am I leffing! These three belles, you see, passed from girlhood to womanhood; they married and gave up the peppy activities of youth for a more settled existence; and having indulged themselves all their lives, it was almost too hard to stop.

Just look through any family album if you wish proof. That can't be Aunt Agatha—that slim little thing! Indeed, it's none other than Agatha, before Nature slipped up with twenty-five pounds in hand and said, "Aggie, these belong to you. I've been saving them up all these years." And so on and on.

Could you find four better looking young people than those you see on these two pages? Anita Louise, so fragile looking and ethereal. Olivia de Havilland, vivid and luscious. Jean Parker, with her gypsy grace. And the little newcomer, Simone Simon, who, after a bad start in Hollywood has now crashed through with a fine performance in "Girls' Dormitory" and whose young-girl charm is delighting everybody.

Don't think for a moment that this beauteous quartette gives no thought for the morrow. They know, and their studios know, and their wise (Continued on page 98)

YOU'LL BE SEEIN' US!

Six bright young people who soon will step into stardom's dazzling spotlight

Doris Dudley

Eleanore Whitney

Jimmy Ellison

Douglas Walton

Here's a crew of Hollywood youngsters to keep your eye on! They're the younger bloods of the screen who are distinguishing themselves in the smaller roles given them in big pictures. Soon they will outgrow supporting parts to move on to featured ones—and then on to that glittering estate called stardom! Look them over from left to right, top row.

First, Frances Farmer, who made a hit in Bing Crosby's "Rhythm on the Range," will soon be seen in "Come and Get It." Next, dashing Patric Knowles, Errol Flynn's good pal, who plays with him in "Charge of the Light Brigade." Eleanore Whitney, that young whirlwind of tap, showed great promise in "Three Cheers for Love" and probably will trump that performance in "College Holiday." Then there's Jimmy Ellison, who has made his own fan following through his acting in the "Hop Along Cassidy" pictures. The newest of this series is "Heart of the West."

And right, Douglas Walton achieved a difficult feat recently and came off with flying colors. He made his role of Lord Darnley in "Mary of Scotland" so vivid that he registered in that great line-up of big stars. And, although Doris Dudley's first picture is yet to be seen, Hepburn's "Portrait of a Rebel," her previous stage experience makes her another star-in-the-making. She looks a little like Katie, too, doesn't she?

SEVERAL YEARS ago Hollywood's fashion crown sat upon the heads of one or two stars who were famous for their knack of wearing dazzling clothes. They were gals who dared to try out the newest and dizziest fads—often even originated some of their own. They spent fortunes every year in an attempt to out-dress any other star in town. Gloria Swanson was one of these and she earned to be a Clothes Horse!

her title of "clothes horse" because of the spectacular costumes she wore both on and off the screen. Lilyan Tashman was undisputed owner of "Hollywood's best-dressed woman" title up to the time of her death. And strangely, although there have been designers to step forth and name other stars as "best-dressed," there never was another who held the title as uniquely as did Lil Tashman.

Today, the whole Hollywood viewpoint on clothes is quite different. The stars who are pointed out for their chic are, on a whole, women who dress conservatively rather than spectacularly. And most of them shun the "clothes horse" stamp. Of course, Hepburn, Garbo and Margaret Sullavan go to the other extreme by professing a complete indifference to anything that looks like a smart costume—but probably of the three, Garbo is the only one who is really sincere about it.

Left, again the Russian influence in the Michael wardrobe. This time it's a wine red wool coat with collar and side opening edged with Persian lamb. The cartridge belt idea is lifted from a Cossack's uniform. Russian turban of the coat cloth and lamb.

Gertrude's favorite sports suit is the one below. It's blue tweed with three-quarter length jacket and matching skirt. Her beret is navy blue stitched wool to match her blouse. That narrow gold chain is her pet piece of jewelry and about the only one she wears.

Just think over some of the stars today who have a reputation for off-screen smartness—Norma Shearer, Claudette Colbert, Myrna Loy, Carole Lombard and many others—all of them are almost uniformly tailored by day, leaving any flights of fashion to their few formal evening appearances. Of this group, Carole Lombard probably is the most clothes conscious.

MARLENE DIETRICH, of course, is in a class by herself because she makes a definite attempt to be an individualist in her dressing. She comes closest to the Tashman type because she loves to startle her audience by what she wears. She uses her clothes as a publicity getter—and what's more it works. Marlene is the 1936 version of the Hollywood clothes horse. And although you may envy her flair for lavish and stunning clothes, she doesn't make a very practical pattern by which to gauge your own shopping. It's fun to have a big wardrobe and to have it arresting but most of us can't afford to be just clothes horses. And it is far smarter to have your clothes subtly emphasize your personality than to have them dominate it! Don't you agree with me? Gertrude Michael does.

Right out of the same studio as the dazzling Marlene, Gertrude's brand of chic couldn't be more different, more down to earth. Yet, she stands (Continued on page 83)

Anne Rockefeller

Sert Room, The Waldorf-Astoria, New York. "Whether I'm in the Sert Room of The Waldorf-Astoria—at home—or at the homes of my friends—I notice that Camels are the favorite."—Anne C. Rockefeller

...and her famous "Little Dinners"

MISS ANNE C. ROCKEFELLER, of the distinguished New York family, enjoys entertaining in a casual, unpretentious way—intimate little dinners with a few friends who share her interest in the arts. Good conversation, unhurried pleasure . . . the menu itself kept very simple. Just soup and entrée . . . a pause for a Camel . . . followed by a green salad, dessert, and coffee . . . with Camels between courses and after to accent subtle flavors. "Smoking Camels," Miss Rockefeller says, "makes the choicest delicacy taste that much better. They help digestion, too, and bring a delightful sense of well-being, an at-peace-with-the-world mood. When entertaining, I always see to it personally, as a compliment to my guests, that there are plenty of Camels within their reach."

A few of the distinguished women who prefer Camel's costlier tobaccos:

Mrs. Nicholas Biddle, Philadelphia
Mrs. Powell Cabot, Boston
Mrs. J. Gardner Coolidge, II, Boston
Miss Mary Byrd, Richmond
Mrs. Thomas M. Carnegie, Jr., New York
Mrs. Ernest du Pont, Jr., Wilmington
Mrs. William I. Hollingsworth, Jr., Los Angeles
Mrs. Chiswell Dabney Langhorne, Virginia
Mrs. Jasper Morgan, New York
Mrs. Langdon Post, New York
Mrs. Nicholas G. Penniman, III, Baltimore
Miss Lucy Saunders, New York
Mrs. Brookfield Van Rensselaer, New York

Add to the joy of good digestion by Smoking Camels

REMEMBER the friendly touches that make Anne Rockefeller's dinners so charming. A simple menu, plenty of Camels. Smoking Camels, scientists agree, stimulates the flow of digestive fluids—alkaline digestive fluids that play such a welcome part in good digestion.

Smoke as many Camels as you wish, during meals and after. As Frank, head waiter of The Waldorf's Sert Room, says: "Excellent food calls for costlier tobaccos. In the Sert Room, where discriminating people gather, Camels are the favorite." Their delicate flavor gives each succeeding Camel a never-tiring taste. And, being mild, Camels never get on your nerves. Smoke them for digestion's sake!

Delicious, golden brown Griddle Cakes such as these can be made by following the recipe in this month's Modern Hostess leaflet, which is yours for the asking.

IF I WERE to tell you that Bob Brough likes hot breads for breakfast, lunch and dinner, probably the only answer that you would make to that remark would be "So what?" unless, of course, you happened to know that this very Mr. Brough is none other than Robert Taylor! And then? Well, come now, gals, confess that that would be entirely different!

When I tell you that you can get recipes for some of his hot bread favorites—absolutely free—just by sending in the coupon at the end of this article, it ought to please a good many of you more than any other recipes we could possibly offer. We seem to be besieged, these days, with requests for news and still more news about this newest "find" whose present record of 5,000 fan letters a week has amazed everybody—the young man in question perhaps most of all!

The fact that Bob, as a boy, was a champion doughnut eater, that he consumed his own weight in Griddle Cakes during his youth and that to this day he insists that no chicken dinner is complete without plenty of rich, flaky biscuits, becomes a subject of real interest to us all. In fact, anything concerning this new star is news.

Yet, only a little over two years ago a certain dark-haired, blue-eyed young fellow, with a tennis racquet probably swinging at his side, could stroll across the campus of Pomona College without causing any particular commotion.

But nowadays his every public appearance is the signal for a riot, which reached an all-time high on a recent visit to New York when it required fifteen patrolman to keep him from being mobbed!

What does handsome Mr. Taylor think of all this? Well, to paraphrase a famous saying, his attitude seems to be, "If this be Fame, make the most of it!" With certain reservations, perhaps, he seems to be enjoying it hugely, while with no reservations he thinks many aspects of his present prominence are pretty funny.

"What, another interview on the things I like to eat!" Bob remarked, with (Continued on page 74)

Mrs. Adam K. Luke, Jr. says: "Pond's Cold Cream certainly keeps my pores fine."

Faults that start in your UNDER SKIN

A SINGLE blemish can dim the freshness of your skin ... make you look older than you are.

A few coarse pores say, "She's getting on in years"—just as loudly as lines and wrinkles say it. Stubborn things—that keep on getting worse till you learn their real cause and the real way to treat them.

Deep-skin rousing needed

The truth is, almost all skin faults get their start, not on the surface, but in your underskin.

Miss Jane Mellon
"Pond's Cold Cream keeps my skin soft and clear—smooths out little lines."

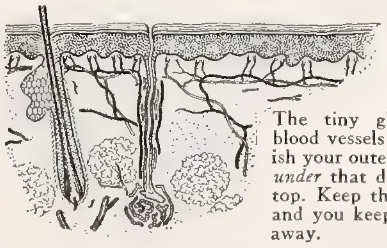
In your underskin are little hidden glands and cells and blood vessels. These are the foundation of your outer skin's health. The minute they function poorly, pores begin to clog. And then blemishes come. Even lines are really nothing but creasings in your outer skin, caused by failing tissues underneath.

But—you can rouse that underskin to healthy vigor—by the regular use of Pond's invigorating deep-skin treatment.

Twice daily—for a fault-free skin

Pond's Cold Cream goes deep into the pores. Its specially processed oils loosen every particle of dirt. Easy to wipe it all off.

Now the rousing treatment—more Pond's Cold Cream briskly patted in. How wonderful it feels. Blood tingling. Skin glowing . . . and so much softer! You are waking up that underskin.



Aging faults start here

The tiny glands, cells, blood vessels which nourish your outer skin are all under that dark layer on top. Keep them active—and you keep skin faults away.

Every night, pat in Pond's Cold Cream to loosen dirt, make-up. Wipe off. Pat in more cream briskly—to rouse your underskin, keep it working properly, so annoying little faults can't age your skin.

Every morning, and during the day, repeat this treatment with Pond's Cold Cream. Your skin becomes softer every time—looks younger. And it's all smooth for your powder.

SPECIAL 9-TREATMENT TUBE
and 3 other Pond's Beauty Aids

POND'S, Dept. L50, Clinton, Conn. Rush special tube of Pond's Cold Cream, enough for 9 treatments, with generous samples of 2 other Pond's Creams and 5 different shades of Pond's Face Powder. I enclose 10¢ to cover postage and packing.

"The Queen Has a Most Excellent Taste for Tea"

SOME gracious Victorian lady may well have ventured such an opinion, for it was known that England's great Queen Victoria had had her private tea blended specially to her taste by the famous tea house of the time—Ridgways (Est. 1836).

a mock serious expression and a twinkle in his eyes, when I went to see him recently. "First you want to know what meats I like and then, not satisfied with that seemingly unimportant bit of information, just a short time later you want me to talk further on the food subject. Is there no satisfying your curiosity on my eating habits?" he inquired, laughing.

But, as I explained to him, it was some time back when I had spoken to him and since then he has made millions of new friends through the excellence of his work in "Private Number," "His Brother's Wife," and "The Gorgeous Hussy."

"YOU see how it is," I said to my amused "victim," almost apologetically, although determination was apparent in my very attitude as I took out my notebook and tapped it with the sharpest of pencils, "I'm only a culinary reporter, and it is my sole duty to interview you on your favorite foods and on no other subject. I did not come to ask you what books you have in the library of your new home—no, I'm the gal who wants to know about the kitchen and the dining room. I'm not even supposed to ask you to give me the lowdown on how it feels to find yourself starring in a picture with Greta Garbo after but two short years in Hollywood. Yes, I'm just a cook!"

At which Bob, who has the keenest sense of humor imaginable, threw back his head, laughed and answered all my questions, ending up with the helpful suggestion that I probably would be able to get several swell recipes for his favorite hot breads from his colored cook.

"After all, he's the one who knows what I like to eat and how these foods are prepared," Bob said. "In my opinion, colored people are among the best cooks in the world and I'd match my man's cooking with anyone's. Get him to tell you how he makes biscuits—they fairly melt in your mouth. And his announcement, 'Mistuh Taylor there is Griddle Cakes for breakfast,' makes getting up for even the earliest of picture assignments lose its terror. I advise you to ask for that recipe, too.

"I don't think the doughnuts he makes are quite as good as the ones made expressly for me once by a dear little lady back home in Nebraska. But they'll do—especially when they're rolled in cinnamon and sugar and served with a cup of really good steaming coffee. And his Corn Fritters can't be beat! I've watched him make them when I've been expecting my mother and some friends for a real Southern style supper. Why, his pride in these fritters is equalled only by mine if I place a fast shot into the far corner of the tennis court when my opponent's up at the net. And that reminds me. . . ." and Bob's longing glance out the window told me more clearly than words that he was hoping to have time for a game on this all-too-rare "day off." So I quickly brought the interview to a close, but not before getting Bob's permission to ask the presiding genius of his kitchen for the recipes he uses when making "Mistuh Taylor's" favorite hot breads.

As a result, I'm pretty proud of the recipes I am able to pass on to you. Golden brown biscuits that not only "melt in your mouth," as Bob said, when served with plenty of butter, but also make a marvelous topping for chicken and meat pies in general. Doughnuts that might be bettered "in Nebraska," but personally I'm from Missouri! Griddle Cakes that, because of a simple little secret, are miracles of lightness—an attribute not always associated, alas, with these breakfast favorites. And then there are those Southern Corn Fritters. We mustn't forget about those, must we? For they can be served with almost any meal and will make a distinct hit with every man who tastes them.

Yes, there's no denying that all men like those foods that come under the rather elastic heading of "hot breads." Indeed, you'll discover that they will even overlook possible shortcomings in a meal if some sort of fresh-from-the-oven bread makes its appearance on the table. Nor are children far behind them in their liking for this type of home-made treat, although considerable restraint is advisable in serving pancakes and doughnuts to the smaller fry.

Of course, there are many other hot breads besides those mentioned by Bob which also deserve consideration. Graham Muffins, for instance, for which you will find a splendid recipe at the end of this article—just above the coupon which brings the Taylor recipes to you. These muffins may be varied by adding blueberries in season. Or raisins may be folded into the batter, using a half cup or more of the seedless variety. Dates also, sprinkled with a little flour and chopped fine, make a pleasing variant, and you can add chopped nuts if you wish to be even dressier.

The raisin and date idea also may be used with the Taylor biscuits in the leaflet, although they are so good plain that it does seem a bit like gilding the lily. However, I do favor adding a California touch to these biscuits if you intend serving them for afternoon tea. This is the way it's done in Hollywood.

After the biscuit dough has been made (by following Bob's cook's directions) cut out your biscuits with a very small-size cutter. Place biscuits on lightly greased baking sheet at least half an inch apart. Press into the direct centre of each biscuit a half tablet of sugar which has been dipped in orange juice. Bake as per directions given in the recipe. The melted, orange-flavored tablet gives a new and distinctive touch to an already worthy favorite. A little grated orange rind added to the dough is also recommended. Be sure to cut out or copy the above directions so that, when you get the recipes in return for sending in your coupon, you will also know how to go about making this special tea-time version.

With all these hot bread favorites of Bob's, however, you will probably serve coffee rather than tea most of the time—especially with the Griddle Cakes and doughnuts, which practically demand this particular beverage as an accompaniment. But when it comes to coffee I agree with Bob Taylor that it must be good coffee and should be served steaming hot. The question in my mind is not one of whether you have cream with your coffee, or serve it black, or with condensed or evaporated milk, or with my favorite half-and-half (half cream, half evaporated milk, an idea that is both economical and deceptive). The important thing lies in having the coffee fit to drink in the first place!

At least once a year, it seems, I make my impassioned plea in print for better coffee! Generally it's after having had a muddy and bitter cup of that brew in a home where they really should know better! Yet the rules are so few and so simple to follow that I marvel that we do not have perfect coffee on every table. Have you ever really criticized your method and its results, by the way? Here then are a few simple pointers in my nonpartisan campaign for better coffee, regardless of the brand and method employed.

The utensil you use, whether it's an old-fashioned coffee pot, drip type, percolator or a Silex type of coffee maker, must be so thoroughly clean that there isn't a trace of old coffee, soap, soda or any cleaning agent to be found. Always wash the coffee equipment in hot water right after it has been used. Drain well and allow to dry in the air and sunlight, if possible. An occasional boiling with soda and water will also help to keep the equipment clean and sweet.

ALWAYS serve coffee as soon as possible after it has been prepared. If it must stand then keep the pot over very low heat so that the coffee, once it's made, never reaches the boiling point. Nor should you let it get cold and then reheat it. Always use clear, fresh water, of course. And if you are using the drip method be sure to pour the water on the grounds as soon as it comes to a full boil.

If you prefer a caffein-free coffee (especially late at night, as many do) be particularly careful how you make it, for people are apt to be more critical of a caffein-free coffee, though often pleased and delighted with the results if the right methods and generous amounts of the coffee are used.

So brew yourself a copious amount of the sort of coffee you are sure to enjoy and all men are certain to praise. Serve with one of the special Bob Taylor hot bread favorites included in this month's leaflet. And here is the promised muffin recipe.

GRAHAM MUFFINS

¼ cup butter or other fat
¼ cup sugar
1 egg
1 cup graham flour
1 cup white flour
4 teaspoons baking powder
½ teaspoon salt
¾ cup milk

Cream butter and sugar together thoroughly. Add well beaten egg. Combine the two flours with baking powder and salt. Sift together and add to first mixture alternately with the milk. Bake in greased muffin pan in hot oven (400°F.) for 25 minutes, or until done.

happy about my picture."

When she finally alit beside me I asked her whether she thinks she is like her screen personality—really. And she said, laughing again, "At some times but not all the time. Some of the times in that picture I feel ashamed when I see myself, when I felt naked. Other times—yes, I say, that is me.

"I am, you see, a 'Child of Destiny.' I cannot help what happens to me. I can do nothing about it. I never have done anything about it. I have never worked for what has come to me. I have never made a plan in all my life. I have never said what I hope to do or want to do. I know that I have nothing to say about me —and that is good. I don't care," and Simone, clad in a man's heavy maroon dressing gown, many sizes too large for her, and wearing a man's leather lounging slippers, flopped back on the divan we were sharing and laughed. Lest you be confounded, this is one of the costumes in which you will see her in "Ladies in Love"—in which the small novice in Hollywood is pitting herself against the established stardoms of Janet Gaynor, Loretta Young and Constance Bennett. And which doesn't, obviously, hamper Simone. She wouldn't care. She keeps to herself on the set. She is seldom in any of the informal set pictures made. She spends the time, between her own scenes, watching the others work—very quietly or as "very quietly" as Simone can ever be. She has no personal maid in the studio. She takes care of herself, totes her own make-up box around, touches up her own make-up when necessary, eats her luncheon alone in her dressing-room, singing to herself most of the time.

"SURE," Simone was saying, "I believe in fate. Here today and tomorrow, pouf, I am gone! And no matter what I do today will not affect tomorrow. So why do anything? I believe in astrologers, in palmists and in clairvoyants. I go to them many times. I believe in gypsies who cross my hand with silver—or do I cross theirs? I never thought, when a child, about what I would do when I grew up. I always knew that what I would be I would be and that there wasn't anything I could do about it. And so I did nothing.

"In Budapest someone told me I should become a sculptor because I make little funnies out of clay to make me laugh. So I get on the train and go to Paris. And study under a famous sculptor, a winner of the Prix de Rome. And he tell me no, no, not sculpture—drawing. I should take up drawing. So, I do. Someone suggest that I become a fashion designer. I think that might be fun to make pictures so that so many women dress better. But I begin to make charcoal drawings of my friends and they are so much fun I keep on.

"And then one day, in the year of 1931, I am having a mocha by myself on the terrace of the Cafe de la Paix when a young Russian comes dashing to me like a Cossack in full pursuit. I can't think what he can want, not knowing him at all. His face seemed so wild. And then he tells me that he is Tourjansky, a refugee from Moscow, where he had been very big in the Art Theatre and then became one of the leading European directors. He looked at me there, through eyes he had closed like slits, and people even crowded around to see what was the matter with us and then he sat down beside me and he said, 'Mademoiselle, to me you are beautiful!'

"I THOUGHT, here is a madman. And I say as much. And then he tells me who he is and says that I am the perfect type for his next picture and that he has been looking for me. And that is what I mean," said Simone Simon, "he had been looking for me. I had not been looking for him. I had done nothing to bring about a meeting with this man, nothing but to sip mocha and to mind my own concern. And there he was. So, why not? I let him make a test for Adolphe Osso, the producer, and I get a contract and the role of pierrette in 'Chanteur Inconnu.'

"When I was a little child, I used to stand by myself making believe that I was doing roles I had seen done by famous stars of the Comedie Francaise. But I never thought to try to get them for myself. I knew that if they were for me to do they would be fitted onto me as a glove is fitted on my hand in a shop. Destiny gives me the little golden keys," laughed Simone, "and I am a good child and wait until I am given these gifts.

"And then someone give me another role and after that another. And then the third role I play is 'A Petite Chocolatiere' and it was directed by Marc Allegrot, who was the hand of Destiny that led me, after a little while, to Hollywood. He was the one to see that I am not at heart only the comedy ingenue I had been playing. He gave me more serious roles to do. He said, 'There is a richer side of your artistic nature, Simone.' He team me with Jean Pierre Aumont in 'Lac aux Dames', which is the screen play of Vicki Baum's 'Martin's Summer', and I have success. And then what you call a Hollywood scout saw me in that screen play and ask me to make a test. I make one. They give me a contract and I come to Hollywood, and I am glad I am here at the studio. I like the way they do things. I like the way they handle me and bring the things out in me.

"But before I come here I made two other pictures in France—'Les Yeux Noirs' and 'Les Beaux Jours.' And then they ask me to go on the stage, between times, and I make my debut under the direction of Arthur Willmetz of the Bouffes Parisiens Theatre—I play with Sacha Guitry in 'O Mon Bel Inconnu' and later they star me in 'Toi C'est Moi.'

"ALL this is just the facts of me," said Simone, feet tucked under the voluminous robe, flinging gold-brown hair back from her brow. "If it is dull, I tell you only because all of it is Destiny, every single thing I do, every step I take, every thing that has happened to me. I work hard when I have the work given to me to do. But I do not work to get the work, you see what I mean? You cannot force the hand of Fate. She deals to whom she pleases. You and I, we may as well be pleased with what she deals."

"Yes," I said. I was trying to figure this child-woman out to some satisfactory conclusion, so that I could tell you, definitely, what she is like. I can't. I don't know what she is like. She probably doesn't know herself. Someone had told me, "She is a cross between Lupe Velez and Clara Bow, as Clara was in the beginning." I don't agree. There is the same child of nature in her, yes. The child that is or was in Clara and in Lupe. But it is an older child, of an older civilization. And the patina of sophistication is more suavely laid. She is like Clara and Lupe mainly in that she does what she feels like doing, says what she feels like saying and let the devil take the hindmost.

She was telling me things about herself. She most admires Garbo on the screen. For, she said, "Garbo is the genius of the screen." And she added, "Among the men I like that Gary Cooper." Her eyes rolled in what should be a very Gary-gratifying fashion!

She has made some girl-friends in Hollywood—for the first time in her life. Not movie girls, just girls. She said, "I never had many girl-friends in Europe. Just one, maybe two to whom I could talk and confide my secrets. I always was more pleased with boy company. But I did not have even much of that. First I was too young and then I was too busy. I have never had many what you call dates, never have gone often to dancing places and cafes. I do not like to go now but if I did like to go I would not go and then talk about it as they do here in Hollywood. I cannot understand that. They will say 'Oh, that old Troc' or that old Biltmore or that old this place or that, 'how they bore me!'—and then they keep right on going. Why do they go if it bores them so? Or doesn't it bore them? And if it doesn't why do they say so? Why do people say things they do not mean about little things?" asked Simone Simon. How could I tell her who would have so little time for happy hypocrisies?

"I like to be alone," said Simone. "I make good company for myself, I play the piano and I sing. I am happy with blue things around me. I mean, I like blue dresses and a blue room and a blue car. When I came to Hollywood the first two things I buy are a blue car and a book of fairy tales."

"Fairy tales?" I murmured politely, at risk of being scorched by Simone.

"Fairy tales are simple and plainly told," explained Simone with heavy patience (for Simone who is not patient), "and they help me with my English.

"I can cook, too, and I can sew. French girls are taught these things. And I have my work. And now after the picture has been called a success I want to stay here always and forever. And until—"

"Until—?"

"Until, maybe, I fall in love and want to marry. Then I would give it all up, would give up my career for that. Yes, but I would. Because, you see, I know what love is. I know how it is when love is here," and Simone laid her small capable hand on her breast. "And I know how it is when love is gone. I have not had any romances, any of what you call the 'crushes.' No, not even any flirtations for more than an eyelash or a dance. But I have been in love. Yes, deeply in love. And I am glad that I know what love is because it gives you wealth inside."

"It gives you wealth inside. . . ." I think that is one of the loveliest, most poignant lines I have ever heard said about love, about which so very little that is new and fresh can be said.

Yes, it gives her wealth inside. Gay, sullen, amenable, rebellious, possible and impossible—coquetry and boredom and outrageousness, fatalism and capriciousness—all of the strands in that brilliantly hued, tangled skein are wound around the hidden, the warm deep heart of Simone Simon—with wealth inside.

Cagney Tells Jimmy's Story

all, he'll give confidences freely.

It was a warm day when we talked over his case in the living-room of a small suite in a moderate priced Manhattan hotel. He was registered there under another name. Jimmy was clad in a pair of brown plaid trousers, a clean white shirt opened at the neck without benefit of tie, a casual sort of tan wool coat and dark blue bedroom slippers. He didn't bother about socks—I mean on the feet!

He had just signed with the newly-formed Grand National Film Company for one feature picture. This followed the headline battle with his old company, in which executives and lawyers fought it out while Jimmy got more healthy and sunburned in a little New England coast town. His companion on this back-to-nature hideout had been Ed McNamara, the singing policeman of the New York force. Ed did the cooking and Jimmy was the dishwasher and he was crazy about it.

"What I've been looking for all my life, that place," he told me. "Gosh, I hope I can get back there soon."

"Jimmy," I said to him, "money, obviously, isn't important to you. Why this particular fight that kept you off the screen for months and must have cost you plenty? What did you really want?"

"Fewer and better pictures and something to say about my own stories," he answered.

Then he told me about the deal for his film with Grand National. So much money in the bank—and it's plenty for a production—so many clauses in which Jimmy has his say about the cast, scenario and director. All to the good. But I couldn't help suggesting:

"The best picture in the world can't make money until it's shown in a sufficient number of the right theatres. How about distribution?" And a few moments later, as if in answer, there was a telephone call from the head of one of the biggest theatre chains. He wanted to see Jimmy and, you can take it from me, it wasn't to buy him a cup of tea. Jimmy said, gleefully, when that particular telephone conversation was completed:

"I'm not worrying. My picture will be on the screens where it ought to be shown." Before we had finished the interview there was a second call—this time from the representative of another group of financial men—they'd like to be in on the financing of Cagney pictures. And, quite confidentially, there was also the meaningful suggestion from the executive of one of the major companies—not the one with which he had been affiliated—that, "When this is over," meaning the legal complications over his old contract, he's ready to talk contract terms with Cagney. It was quite a revelation, this particular nibble, what with the generally accepted idea on the Coast that producing corporations stick together. I imagine his old bosses would have been quite surprised at the source of this offer.

I couldn't help recalling some of the other big stars of former years who'd been bitten by the producing bug, to their own subsequent dismay, and detriment of their bank accounts. Nor could I ignore the possibility that Mr. Cagney might be too close to the Jimmy picture to truly gauge values for his own production.

"That's what I've got to find out," he answered. "I think I'm right, I think I know what's best for me. I can't go on just thinking it and be afraid to learn the truth. Needless to say, the lesson could be a very costly one in dollars to him, but I doubted whether, as far as the experience could affect his own principles, the toll would be as great as some people might imagine. If Hollywood ever fails Jimmy there are other roads to travel and you have the conviction, as you talk to him seriously about those things, that somehow or other Cagney will always eat. He doesn't need much money to buy what he wants out of life.

On the subject of Hollywood, Cagney harbors no illusions about what can happen to him and certainly he has no delusions about the people who inhabit, with him, that particular little world.

"OUT there," he said, "it's such a small, closely-bound, one-idea community that people get crazy impressions of their own importance and a lot of the so-called big ones are over-rated. They'd be little fish in a big pond like New York, but in Hollywood they're whales in a mud-puddle. That can't last forever. It's easy for producers to spend stockholders' money and it's grand for the actors who get it on the payrolls to spend it just as fast—but money doesn't stay always in the same control, if it isn't bringing a fair return to the investors.

"And the stars—well, they amaze me. They'll struggle for years to get a break—they'll go hungry, they'll work and they'll be humble about their own talents, but let them once blink their eyes in the glare of their own names in electric lights and they'll devote more energy to playing the part of a celebrity, off the screen, than they give to the serious business of showing, before the cameras, why they should have been made stars in the first place. Acting in Hollywood is just a job that you can hold by giving it your best. You can't do it well if you're not sold on the tools you must use."

We talked about other stars and he said swell things about men who might be considered his rivals. There was a soft, considerate note when he mentioned the name of a has-been who found how slippery the Hollywood toboggan can be. "He's a gentleman—a grand fellow," Jimmy's voice was full of admiration. "He's always dressed carefully in the good clothes he bought years ago—but not a quarter in his pocket. You'd never know it. I like them when they can take it on the chin without crying out loud."

We talked about directors—this one was an ace, according to Jimmy; that one, another big-timer, he called a "phoney." "They'll find him out yet, not only does he give nothing to a picture he directs, but he drags it down." The megaphone wielder under discussion obviously would not be pleased.

One moment he sprawled lazily in a big arm chair, throwing out verbal bombshells into the humid air, apparently relaxed, except for the fire that shot from under his half-closed eyelids. The next second he was standing in the middle of the room, two feet far apart, that fighting look in his face. You waited expectantly for the grand explosion. But what he said with a sudden laugh was:

"Well, how about lunch?"

The waiter came and we studied the menu.

"I'd like soft-shell crabs," Jimmy remarked. "I go for them."

They weren't on the menu and the waiter told him so.

"I have a feeling you'll get them, Jimmy," I said.

And Mr. Cagney did have soft-shell crabs for his lunch. He didn't touch the baked potato or bread and there was no dessert—just tea with lemon. Slight as he looks on the screen, Jimmy doesn't come by the slender lines naturally. He's from a family of stout men and he's in training 362 days in the year—exercises every morning and watches what he eats. He doesn't care at all about clothes; as long as the suit fits he'll wear it. He hates crowds, except when they're filling a theatre to watch one of his pictures, and he's satisfied with the few friends with whom he spends his leisure time in Hollywood — Bob Montgomery, Pat O'Brien, Frank McHugh and Chester Morris are among his pals. He thinks Ronald Colman is swell on the screen—he admires his suave manner and poise. He hates fiction stories. He, whose film plots have been almost lurid in their melodrama, never reads them; his shelves are filled with biographies and histories. The Civil War is his favorite period and he eats up everything he can read about that era. He has a sneaking feeling that some day he'd like to get himself into a background of those days and do a real picture about it. It's quite a jump for the "St. Louis Kid."

We talked about the Cagney road that led to Hollywood—an amazing story, take it from me—and going as far back as the adolescent year when Jimmy left his freshman class at Columbia University, where he studied art, and went to work as a bundle-wrapper in a New York department store. Wrapping had been his livelihood on a part-time basis, even when he was a high school student. In those days he was convinced he'd be a good artist some day. His first full-time position paid sixteen dollars a week and that wasn't enough—Jimmy needed more money, and needed it badly. So when a friend came to him and said, "I know where you can earn twenty-five a week," Jimmy said, "Let's go."

The job was in a vaudeville act and Cagney was supposed to dance. He couldn't, but he fooled the manager and learned so quickly and so well that after touring tank towns for a few seasons he was teaching professional dancing in a Broadway terpsichorean institute. There was a period, too, when he managed a dancing school in Elizabeth, N. J., but the suburbanites weren't as serious about working as Jimmy thought they should be and after a year he told the financial backer of the place that he couldn't make money for him that way.

Then there were years of other vaudeville acts, parts in musical comedies, minor roles in dramatic productions and finally "Penny Arcade," which led to Jimmy's first movie contract. His salary boost on the Coast made a chart like the sky-rocketing record of the stock market in pre-crash years. He had more money than he could spend because, when he travels, he doesn't go in for de luxe suites in the big hotels. He wouldn't know what to do with an English butler around the house and he doesn't own a Rolls Royce

When he was a Broadway "ham," Jimmy thought George Kelly was the greatest stage director in the world—and he still thinks so. In fact, Jimmy has about the same set of values with which he started out as a bundle-wrapper and, if circumstances and fortune have moved him into a more expensive atmosphere, he feels exactly the same way about most things as he did when the opportunity for a nine-dollar-a-week raise took him out of a department store and landed him on two dancing feet before the footlights.

"I've got to act like I feel," says Jimmy Cagney and that's exactly what he will do regardless of what the rest of this world thinks about it and what it will mean to Mr. Cagney.

He Gets Away with Murder

plans to see the world from Pole to Pole, with all the far-flung horizons thrown in. Preferably with a wife. No, he hasn't found her yet—but he's as "willin'" as Barkis; he's looking, he's ready for marriage . . . .

Anyway, he got away with murder when he used to run away, too. The family let him run! He always came back. He got away with murder, definitely, when, after graduating from Princeton and spending a year or so in New York, he went home and broke the news to his family—the news that their only son was not going to be a dignified architect creating skyscrapers but an actor.

"After all the preparatory years of education at Mercersburgh Academy," Jimmy said, "after the years at Princeton, after all their conservative hopes for me—an actor. There's never been such a thing in the family with the exception of a sort of distant uncle who confided in me that he had been an actor in his youth and had subsequently spent several years in jail! I could, he said, take it or leave it. It was all the information he had to give me. I left it—

EVEN then, as I say, I got away with murder, because my folks were swell about it. They were all gathered together in the dining room, I remember, when I spilled the beans. I can see them now. Their faces became kind of white and their eyes kind of glazed when they finally got what I was saying. But then they rallied nobly. They patted the renegade architect on his rather wilted spine and uttered not one word of reproach. I knew that their highest hopes for me were lying on the floor like so much broken china. The Stewarts are not ones to show emotion easily," said James.

He got away with murder in college, too. He took it seriously enough, studied hard but changed his course with his own changes of ambition. He learned to play the accordion in college and rates it high among his scholastic accomplishments.

He said, "I did some things with the Princeton Triangle shows, too. It was fun but I never for one instant entertained the idea that I would become an actor or ever know more of the stage than what I could see across the footlights. I didn't know at the time what swell experience it was.

"Anyway, I kept on getting away with murder. In my first year I found that I was doing badly as a civil engineer. So badly that I was on my way out of college when, for some reason, I changed my course and took up architecture. That course pulled me through. And I graduated, if not Cum Laude, at least with a creditable diploma in my hands.

"I once assisted the magician, Bill Neff, doing his stuff. I had about as much sleight-of-hand ability as an elephant. But I looked so dumb and probably so honest that they just didn't believe I would fool 'em, so I got by with that.

"And then I joined some Princeton fellows with the Falmouth Stock Company on Cape Cod. That was the summer after I graduated. I still hadn't the foggiest notion of becoming an actor. They just asked me to trail along. I'd never been to Cape Cod and I thought I'd like to see it.

"Just at the very end of the season we put on 'Goodbye Again' and a New York producer saw it and liked it so well he wanted to do it in New York in the Fall. He asked me to come along and do my part. And I went, again not because I had any idea of becoming an actor, but because I had never lived in New York and thought it would be more fun. People just didn't become actors, I still thought. But no harm in junketing about for a bit before settling down to blue prints and specifications.

I HAD a lot of fun—down to my last cent at times and all that. I'd met Henry Fonda, as you know, and at least we didn't have to make the rounds of the casting offices or do any starving on the well-known park bench because we seemed to be fortunate enough to get the breaks.

"The next summer," Jimmy was saying—as he talked he consumed baked potatoes, macaroni, bread and butter, a quart of certified milk, steak and onions, rice pudding, salad and some more milk—and if that isn't getting by with murder, gastronomically speaking, I don't know what is!—"I went to Boston as stage manager for Jane Cowl in 'Camille.' I didn't tell her when I applied for the job that I had never been a stage manager. I didn't exactly say anything. That's one of the most efficient ways of getting by with murder—just never say anything!

"Well, when Jane Cowl is on the stage, it is vitally important to her that not a pin drop. If a pin does drop, she is undone and so is her stage manager. Well, I got by all right, running around and shushing every one and seeing to it that no one even whispered, checking on everyone being where they should be, seeing to it that the curtain rose on time—until one dreadful night.

"It was during the death scene of 'Camille.' It would be. When Jane Cowl does the death scene from 'Camille,' she gives the most realistic portrayal I have ever seen. She is dying when she does it. Suddenly, on this night, just as she was breathing her last, there came from somewhere off-stage the most horrible and stupendous crashes, bangs, explosions, screams and shrieks. I was dumfounded. I couldn't move. I, not Camille, was dying! I finally discovered that the noises came from the alley directly outside the stage door. If I had opened that door the noises would have come through even more horribly. And also if I opened it I would have had to shriek and scream at the hoodlums who were making the noise in order to make my voice heard above the uproar. I couldn't do anything but stand there and pray and sweat. I did.

WHEN it was all over and the last curtain fell, I expected to pick up pieces of myself and ship them home. Miss Cowl didn't say a word to me. She didn't fire me. She was probably too hurt even for that. She did remark, in my hearing, that she would never be able to play 'Camille' again. The run of the play was nearly over anyway and the company returned to New York as per schedule. Which was just as well for me as I hadn't the fare to go back by myself.

"On another occasion, also in Boston, Hank Fonda and another fellow and I were stranded in a hotel. We had no money to pay for our rooms and food. We thought we'd be marooned there for years. We finally conceived the idea of pooling our scant resources and sending one of us to New York to wangle a job or some money or both. Eventually we were bailed out and jail yawned for us once more in vain.

"Well," drawled Jimmy, "I just kept on getting by with things. I got a part in 'All Good Americans' on a fluke. When I applied for the job they told me they wanted someone who could play a banjo. That was the only requirement. I'd never played a banjo in my life, but I said, casually, that I'd been raised on banjos, born with a banjo in my hand, didn't know how it happened that I didn't have a banjo with me right then. I got the job! I also got a banjo. Then I got a teacher. When I was due for rehearsal next day, I knew three chords, one major and two minor. I kept twanging those chords over and over in an accomplished, easy manner. Maybe there weren't any banjo experts in the cast or in the audience. There couldn't have been because I got by with that, too.

"When they were casting for 'Page Miss Glory' and I was again on the list of applicants they seized hold of me and said, 'You're just the man we want—you've got a swell Southern accent and it's a Southern accent we're after and nothing else but.' I omitted to inform them that I had never been south of the Mason and Dixon line, was a Pennsylvania Dutchman with forebears who fought for the Union—I just drawled, "Yas, ole Massa' or something like that—and became a Southerner for the run of the play.

IT was when I played in 'Yellow Jack' that I knew, for the first time, I wanted to be an actor, to stay an actor. Prior to that play I'd still gone about thinking that it was a lot of fun and swell experience but something in the nature of a vacation, a grand tour of Broadway. I didn't take it seriously. I didn't think it could satisfy me as a life work. It was a hyphen between college and a real career. And then I played in that play. I saw what it meant to the cast and I saw what it meant to the audiences, what they got out of it, how they reacted. And for the first time I realized that giving people such emotions, such uplift, such relaxation could be as worthy a life work as raising skyscrapers or doctoring or any other profession. I threw my hat into the ring—and went home to tell the folks.

"I never thought about the movies for me. I thought about them plenty, especially when Hank went to Hollywood. But I didn't think I had what it takes. I'd see myself in the mirror while shaving and any little ideas I might have had along the Hollywood way were nipped in the shaving brush, so to speak.

"Then came my test for M-G-M. And when they sent for me to come to Hollywood, a long-term contract in my pocket, I felt more like a character in 'A Beggar on Horseback' than I did like James Stewart boarding a train to go West.

"I still don't believe it. I still pinch myself black and blue. I still expect to wake up one balmy morning and find that I've had one swell, sweet dream.

"He get's away with murder," they say. "I got away with murder," says Jimmy of himself.

out both on the screen and off, as one who wears smart clothes that register with you because of their good lines and excellent taste. She never tries for a bizarre or startling effect—she merely selects her clothes cleverly to stress the best points of her particular type.

Just as Jeanette MacDonald, a few months ago, showed you redheads how she selects clothes to suit her type, so Gertrude Michael gives some grand tips this month to all of you who are five feet five, blue-eyed and fair-skinned, topped with light brown hair. Somehow it is rather a spur to your imagination if you can know the fashion tricks of someone who is almost exactly your type and coloring. That's why I think Gertrude's new fall wardrobe will abound with ideas for all of you—and that goes for you, too, who may not be exactly the same coloring or height.

The day we talked clothes, colors and what not, Gertrude had just finished assembling new clothes for her personal use. She had gone about her shopping with an amazing amount of system—nothing slap-dab or hurried. Viola Dimmitt had designed a number of the choicest costumes in the group. And what interested me most was the fact that each outfit had been picked for the specific use to which it must be put. There wasn't a superfluous dress, bought just because it was pretty and might come in handy some day. Instead, she had taken into consideration how much of her time was spent working at the studio, and the costumes she bought were for definite demands in her social life.

Gertrude told me that she was thrilled with the new silhouette which gives her a fitted look through the bodice and waist, with a crisp flare to skirts. She adores tunics, and as you can see, two of her costumes stress this style. She has a taste for variety which definitely is reflected in the six costumes shown here this month. For instance, she likes a Russian flavor to coats and suits. But she picks a dress of quaint Victorian charm for evening hours. Then again, for daytime she likes a simple, modern and tailored line.

SHE loves sports clothes, things which do not need adjusting all the time they are being worn. She is partial to blue but, as you will notice from her new clothes, she doesn't use it monotonously, choosing black, green, red and wine shades as alternates. Fortunately, her own coloring permits her quite a color variety that might be prohibitive for others who have to watch certain shades.

Gertrude's sound ideas on clothes are particularly apparent in her viewpoint on fur coats. She says:

"I think fur coats, in the wardrobes of younger players, should serve a double purpose and be of lines and pelts which allow them to be used as evening wraps."

She dislikes jewelry—in fact, there is hardly a piece of it to be seen in all six of these pictures. The gold chain which you can see on page 66, worn with her tweed suit, is the only piece she likes to wear.

"It's fifty-fifty sentiment and superstition," she laughed, not going any farther into the subject!

One of the first dresses she dragged out of the closet for me to approve, was the black velvet and lace dinner gown on page 64. I fell in love with it. The short sleeves with their beautiful hand-made lace cuffs puff up to give a wide shoulder line. The waist is fitted and very high and the lace collar opening into quite a deep V, reminds me of the Fauntleroy suits little boys had to wear in the early part of this century! The skirt flares at the hem and be sure to notice the length—just the right one for dining and dancing these fall evenings. This is one of Viola Dimmitt's original designs.

Still in a formal mood, Gertrude showed me an evening ensemble of American Beauty red taffeta which solves her problems of being properly garbed for many Hollywood affairs when she's not certain how grand her costume should be. Beneath a tunic coat, which trimly buttons at the waist, she wears a matching gown of utmost simplicity. The whole chic of the dress lies in its cut—the front is rather straight with a high waistline accented by the same velvet flowers which she is wearing outside and on the tunic coat in the picture. But at back the skirt billows out from gathers placed just below the deep, waist-high decolletage—this same back fullness is repeated in the back design of the tunic coat. The tunic she wears as a wrap, removing it only if the party is quite formal.

A daytime ensemble that Viola Dimmitt

DON'T LET ADOLESCENT PIMPLES KEEP YOU OUT OF A JOB

PIMPLES can easily spoil that good impression you hoped to make. Yet—they often occur after the start of adolescence—from about 13 to 25, or longer. At this time, important glands develop and final growth takes place. The whole body is disturbed. The skin gets oversensitive. Waste poisons in the blood irritate this sensitive skin. Pimples break out.

Fleischmann's Yeast clears these skin irritants out of the blood. Then, pimples go! Eat 3 cakes a day, one before meals—plain, or in a little water—until skin clears. Start today!

I'LL FIGHT FOR MY RIGHTS! I WANT ANTISEPTIC POWDER

"...'cause how else am I going to battle nasty germs?"

"Mummy—I know you want to give me the best baby powder you can buy. Well, gee whiz . . . that means Mennen. Why? 'Cause—that's the kind that's Antiseptic. I wish you'd heard what Mrs. Holmes told my nurse today. She said she wouldn't use anything else but Mennen Powder. Said it was a reg'lar germ fighter. Yessir! It chases nasty germs away, for good. And gosh, Mummy, how else am I goin' to battle germs? Besides . . . Mrs. Holmes said it prevents that chafing I'm always complaining about . . . and that rawness I get in my creases. So, gee, Mummy—get me Mennen, will you?"

America's first baby powder is now Antiseptic. But it doesn't cost a penny more. Why use any other!

designed for her has a most unique tunic coat made of quilted wool, of all things. The wool is of thin, crepey texture but achieves quite a heavy look through the close quilting. The modified leg o' mutton sleeve, which you notice Gertrude is very partial to, is used in this suit, also. The tunic buttons to the waist with large self-fabric buttons and a wide suede belt further emphasizes the slender waistline with its sharp flare below. Beneath the coat, there's a plain black wool skirt topped by a shirred white satin blouse. Shoes, gloves and bag match the suede belt.

THE Russian influence is very evident in both a winter suit and coat. The coat, of burgundy red wool, has a narrow edging of black Persian lamb around the high collar and down the entire front closing. The belt buckle resembles a cartridge holder, in the manner of the Cossack uniforms. With this she wears the same Russian turban of Persian lamb which goes so well with her suit.

A heavy dark green jersey makes a stunning two-piece suit which also boasts a liberal trimming of black lamb. The jacket also follows the line of a Cossack uniform even to the silk braid frogs. Her coat, incidentally, is very smart this winter in a more sharply flared version—the skirt, instead of being rather straight as hers is, flares out from a belted and fitted waistline.

Travis Banton, who designs most of Gertrude's screen clothes, is using this flared and fitted line in his coats. His coats match the length of the dress skirts beneath, and since he is making all of his dresses short and full, you can gauge the approximate length of these. On the subject of sleeves, Banton has very definite thoughts. He is making most of his costumes with sleeves that end just above the wrist and are fitted either from that point to the elbow and then fulled, or are given fullness from that point to the shoulder line which is slightly widened.

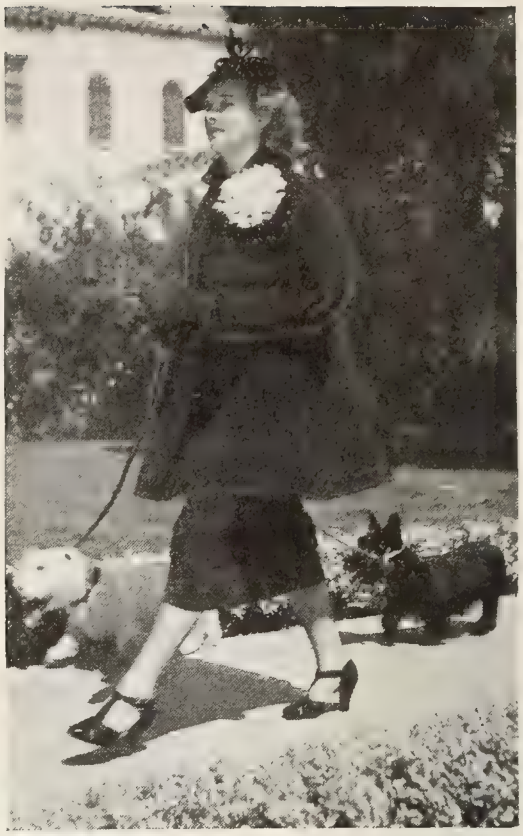
It is interesting to note that Banton is not influenced very perceptibly by the historical periods which seem to be swaying other designers. He declares that, no matter how many influences are discussed as the leading trends for fall fashions, he will keep his creations modern and thoroughly American. In keeping with this theory, any inspiration from historical sources such as the Directoire, Persian or Renaissance, will be so subtle that it will submerge entirely into the strictly modern feeling Banton prefers to stress.

Banton approves thoroughly of the high-crowned hats which are being spotlighted in millinery, but he insists that they be built upward with a backward movement for his purpose.

The fur edging on Gertrude's coat is found again and again, both on wraps and suits.

The flared and fitted coat silhouette, however, is only for you who have youthful, slender figures. In fact, after seeing princess dresses and coats, not to mention all the tightly fitted bodices and empire waists, I think we are all going to have to diet a bit to fit the picture! One consoling thought is that the less accented silhouette, one on less figure-revealing lines, is still popular enough to be listed among the fall successes.

ALL this stressing of the ultra feminine figure got us off on the subject of what to do about proper foundation garments. I asked Gertrude what she thought about it, mentioning that a well-known corset stylist says no one should have less than three definite types of foundations in her wardrobe. Gertrude said she thought that was a very sound idea because with waistlines becoming trimmer and smaller in dresses, it would be necessary to find foundations that molded your figure to those lines. In other words, it will be important to have a foundation that subtly abets the high bust line and yet gives a smooth lengthening curve to the hips.



Tibby and Woggy are aired in a doggy fashion by Bette Davis, wearing her newest fur swagger coat of black Persian lamb. And what is that huge flower? Nothing from a greenhouse, it's a giddy affair made of yarn to look something like a sunflower—only something, however! Doesn't Bette look very smart and nonchalant?

I went on to tell her that this particular corset stylist listed these three types as essential to the complete "foundation wardrobe"—the all-in-one for party and formal use, the girdle for daytime wear and the pantie-girdle for sportswear.

"Won't that run into quite an expenditure for the average budget?" Gertrude asked.

And I said no, because a constant change from one to the other certainly would prolong the life of each. What's more, I don't see how one "all-purpose" foundation can possibly do the job any more.

Incidentally, if you want more and detailed dope on this foundation wardrobe idea, I am including information about some of the newest styles in this month's Shopping Bulletin. I like the idea so much that I thought it would appeal to you and you might want information about some of the newest designs, prices, etc.

But back to the Michael wardrobe. Because California fall days are milder, Gertrude's favorite sports suit is one not trimmed with fur. You can see it on page 66. It's a light blue tweed coat and skirt worn with a navy blue blouse. Again the broad shoulder line is stressed and a tiny collar ties with a cord of the tweed fabric. Unusual pockets and the use of a corded treatment distinguishes the coat. That tricky beret is made of a closely stitched fabric in navy with a small wool pom-pom at one side.

After I left Gertrude, and later when she sent me the photographs of the clothes we had discussed, I thought what a well balanced and planned wardrobe she has. One that has distinction, individuality and smartness but which never tries to make a point of being obviously any of those things. And that, to me, is the essence of being well-dressed, even best-dressed. Gertrude never will have a clothes horse reputation but neither will she be overlooked wherever she wears such attractive and appropriate costumes. And isn't that just our own goal whenever we buy a new outfit?

happy. Everyone must, in all fields of life and work. Understand, please, I don't mean stinginess. That is a quality which is entirely different from the selfishness of which I am speaking. If you go through life, expending your emotions and your energies with a free carelessness, you will have only husks left for your own happiness, your own contentment and success. So Bella and I guard our companionship with jealous hands and we selfishly conserve my energies for work."

Bella, as you probably know, is Mrs. Paul Muni. She gave up her own career on the stage to share Paul's life and to further his success. She is one of that small army of unsung Hollywood wives, content to remain in the background of her husband's triumphs.

"We go to few parties and make few public appearances," Muni went on. "If we go out, I must act. All actors must. We have to live up to the ideas which Hollywood and the rest of the world have built up about us. I know that it is wise to keep what dramatic ability I may possess for my work, so we stay home or find our social pleasure and relaxation with the few close friends with whom I can be myself. That's the foundation for that story about my hermit-like tendencies.

WE'RE really not hermits, at all. We live a perfectly normal life. I don't like or enjoy people in large numbers. Perhaps it is because I suffer with self-consciousness. I don't make friends easily. The few people for whom I have a genuine liking fill my life with all the outside companionship I need.

"Because, you see, Bella and I are very

GIVE A "FACE POWDER PARTY"!

See If You and Your Girl Friends Use the Right Shade of Face Powder

By Lady Esther

You're sure about the shade of face powder you use, aren't you? You're convinced it's the right shade for you, or you wouldn't use it.

Your girl friends feel the same way about the shades they use. Each is certain she uses the right shade.

All right—I'll tell you what I'll do: I'll let you hold a "face powder party" at my expense. What's that? Well, it's a party at which you can have a lot of fun and, at the same time, learn something of great value.

You can hold this party at home or you can hold it at the office during lunch hour.

The Test That Tells!

Here's what you do: First, send for all five shades of my Lady Esther Face Powder, which I offer you free. Then call in several of your girl friends. Try to get girls of different coloring—blondes, brunettes and redheads.

Let each girl select what she thinks is her best shade of face powder. Have her try that shade on. Then, have her "try on" all the other four shades. Let the rest of you act as judges while each girl tries on the five shades.

Then, see how right or wrong each girl has been! Note that in most cases, if not in all, the shade of face powder that proves the most becoming is not the one the girl selected. On the contrary, you'll probably find that the shade that proves most flattering to a girl is one she would never think of using at all.

You can instantly tell which shade is most becoming to a girl. It immediately makes her stand out—makes her look her youngest and freshest. The other shades, you will observe, have just the opposite effect. They make her look drab and years older than she really is.

Why Look Older Than You Really Are?

It's amazing the women that use the wrong shade of face powder. I see evidences of it on every side. Artists and make-up experts also bemoan the fact.

There is one and only one sound way of telling your most becoming shade of face powder and that is by trying on all five shades as I have described above. Trying to select a shade of face powder according to "type" is all wrong because you are not a "type," but an individual. Anyone knows that a blonde may have any one of a number of different colorings of skin while a brunette may have the same. So, trying to match a "type" is fundamentally unsound if not impossible, and may lead to some weird effects.

Prove My Principle!

Be sound, be practical, in the selection of your shade of face powder. Use the test method as I have described here. Clip the coupon now for all five shades of my Lady Esther Face Powder. I will also send you a 7-days' supply of my Face Cream.

(You can paste this on a penny postcard.) (27) FREE

self-sufficient. We don't need others to make us happy. We have tried to build a barrier around our personal happiness, to protect it. That isn't always easy to do, especially when you live in a town which is so brightly spotlighted. It is often so much easier to follow the line of least resistance and do as the Romans do.

"Bella is vitally interested in my work. So, when I'm making a picture, that is our most important mutual concern. Between pictures we travel, take trips to New York to see the new plays and our old friends. We both are tremendously interested in our home. We call it a ranch. But it is really only a five-acre spot in the valley. We enjoy experimenting with gardening and soil culture. We resent outside interests which call us away from our shared pleasures.

"I think that I have discovered one of the reasons for the super-abundance of marriage troubles in Hollywood. I may be wrong, of course, but I believe that a great many people are so busy, trying to impress the outside world with their happiness, that they lose sight of the real joy to be found quietly in their own homes. They work so hard at acting happiness that they have nothing left to offer their own husbands and wives except an empty shell of emotion. They're losing the really worth while things of life because they haven't the courage to build that necessary barrier between themselves and the world. They're afraid of being called temperamental recluses.

"It's the same way with our work. Why give your best performances off the screen, as so many actors do? Why waste precious energy trying to amuse a group of only mildly interested people? When you try to repeat those performances for the cameras or for a theatre audience, the fine edge is gone, the first glow has been rubbed away.

"Not only in Hollywood is this true, but in New York and in every other place where writers, musicians, painters and actors are gathered. Brilliant, clever words are spoken to entertain a group of fellow workers and those words, once spoken, are never written. Songs are sung on the spur of the moment in some noisy, smoke-filled room and are forgotten the next morning. Most of the great artists of the world have been selfish, have refused to parade and exploit their abilities. But most of us in Hollywood fall into the hectic, competitive rush of the town and display our wares promiscuously, instead of saving them for the right moments.

"Again I say, look at Garbo. She, alone, dares to protect herself and her work. That sort of selfishness is really generosity in the final analysis, because she is giving her undivided efforts to her pictures and to the entertainment of the many, instead of the few."

An assistant director called through a loud speaker, summoning Muni to the center of the wheat field. With amazement I watched him slide into the personality of Wang, kneeling in his field, watching with fear-stricken eyes the coming of the storm which was bringing terror and desolation to him and his people. There was nothing left of Muni or of "Pasteur" or of the "Fugitive." There was only a desperate, young Chinaman, waiting for the destruction of his world.

Paul Muni is probably the most thoroughly conscientious actor in Hollywood. He allows nothing to interfere with his careful study of the characters whom he brings to the screen. He lived for several weeks in a colony of Chinese truck farmers, studying their manners, their customs, their intricate language, before he began actual work in "The Good Earth." Before a picture, and during its making, he secludes himself from everyone, even his few most intimate friends, and steeps himself in the personality which he is portraying on the screen.

"I always try to avoid talking for publication because I have nothing startling or interesting to say. I'm what they call 'poor copy,'" he said with a grave smile, when the scene was finished and he had returned to the camp chair. "Some people are naturally exciting in everything they do and say. I am not one of them. At this very moment I am probably one of the happiest, most contented men in the world. There is certainly nothing exciting about that. I don't want to seem smug. I'm proud that I have managed to reach this state of mind."

He leaned forward and there was a warm, eager glow in his brown eyes.

"At last I have reached the place where I can plan not to plan," he told me. "All my life, since I was a small boy in the theatre, I have said to myself, 'I will do this next year. I will try to accomplish that the following year. I will never rest until I reach some definite goal.' Now those days of planning are ended. I have lost the frantic urge for competition. I no longer desire to be the greatest actor or the most spectacular or the most financially successful. My happiness comes first now. I realize that, at best, our lives are short so I'm going to fill the remaining years of mine with the things which mean the greatest happiness to Bella and me.

"I have two more pictures to make under my contract with Warner Brothers. When they are finished, I shall never sign another long-term contract. I want to be free to do as I please, to stay here at home or to travel. Of course, California will always be our home, our headquarters, no matter where we may go.

"If a play or a picture, which I particularly want to do, happens to come my way, I shall do it. But I hope never again to be bound by legal ties to do a certain thing at a certain time. Then, perhaps, with this freedom, I shall have the courage to be myself.

"The rest of my life belongs to Bella and me. If we don't drain from it every drop of happiness that is humanly possible, that will be our own fault. We have been married fifteen years. We have never had any children. At first, that was a great disappointment to us. But, with the passing of the years, the sorrow has grown less poignant. Our very childlessness seems to have became one more bond to strengthen the completeness of our companionship."

Suddenly his words were drowned in the roar of the wind machines. The wheat field rippled beneath the strength of the blast. American and Chinese voices barked directions through the loud speakers. The Chinese peasants, the buffalo, the scraggly dogs moved into their places. The storm had come to wreck the good earth of that California-China. Paul Muni waved his hand and walked across the wind-flayed field.

Watching him, I knew that Hollywood has been all wrong about him. He is not a recluse, a temperamental hermit. He is merely an honest young man, trying valiantly to protect his work and his happiness in a strange city of make-believe where the houses are made of glass and the lights are all spotlights.

Myrna Loy Talks About Marriage

me cutting down floor space on the plans and tucking in closets here and there!"

"Um, just as I feared. You're a housewife at heart!" I told her.

"Of course! Do you know what I've been doing all morning? Looking at samples of living-room curtains and, for the life of me, I can't decide which ones I want."

Myrna Loy, Hollywood's favorite bachelor girl, would never have bothered with curtains.

"It seems to me, though, you have the edge on us other women in this business of marriage," I said. "You've played such grand wives on the screen. You've had the advantage of studying husbands—men in general—at close range. What's the most important thing you've found out about them?"

THE most important thing I've found out is that you can't theorize about men. They're all too different from one another. Women should not get fixed ideas on the subject! For instance, a girl reads somewhere that she should never let a man be sure of her. Then her mother's friend draws her aside confidentially and says, 'Really, my dear, men want peace and comfort most of all and they won't get much of either if you make love a Guessing Game.' By the time the poor girl marries she's so full of theories and systems for holding a husband that her home becomes a kind of laboratory with the genus homo as the practical working specimen. I don't believe in it. It makes life much too complicated."

Myrna simplifies matters considerably. She boils it all down to this: to know how to behave and act so that other people have a cordial reaction to you—that's social technique. It is also, says Myrna, the technique of marriage.

AND it has to be worked at by both parties, not by one alone. My screen husbands, for example. . . . They've been the kind that make a wife want to keep at her best! They were so civilized. Nick, for instance, in 'The Thin Man.' If Nora was a good sport and a gay companion it was because Nick played up to her all the time. And in 'Wife vs. Secretary' Clark Gable indulged in so many little niceties. You couldn't imagine these husbands taking a woman for granted, forgetting to hold up their end of the bargain! They were cultured, humorous without being caustic, they knew how to live."

In a word, they were like Arthur Hornblow himself. For Myrna had unconsciously painted a direct picture of him. It's true, he epitomizes her screen husbands. She married a man who has certain qualities of them all! Elsa Maxwell once referred to Hornblow as "The First Gentleman of Hollywood." And that was the first thing about him that impressed Myrna.

Suddenly I remembered another luncheon long ago when Myrna was still playing exotics. She was dressed as a gypsy and we'd gone to a little tea room near the old Warner Brothers Studio. "Isn't there a dark man in your cup?" Myrna pretended to look. "I don't think so. Not yet. But I'll know the minute he comes!"

"I used to wonder why I liked the atmosphere of the Goldwyn Studio so well," she told me now with a faint chuckle. "I used to wish they'd place me under contract there. And that was odd because they didn't make many pictures and probably I wouldn't have been working much of the time. Each time the studio closed down I felt depressed and didn't know why!"

THE fact that Mr. Arthur Hornblow, Jr., was then an associate producer there seemed to have no connection. It wasn't until about a year and a half ago that she realized what the attraction was.

"I won't generalize and say that it's better always to wait to marry. Sometimes it isn't. Sometimes very young marriages are outstandingly successful. But in my own case I'm glad I didn't marry at nineteen or twenty. I was too busy then to think much about it anyway," said Myrna.

"Your whole perspective changes with an adult outlook. Little things cease to be worrisome, big things don't loom so large. You can afford to be a little amused at life and yourself. I think that's why I've preferred men who were mentally mature to the young ones. They offer a companionship that's stimulating without being wearing. . . ."

She hummed a little under her breath. She reached for another roll. Myrna Loy Hornblow was happy!

SOFT IN AN INSTANT WITH POND'S VANISHING CREAM
POND'S

"I use it for a powder base . . . overnight, too, for extra softening"
Miss Nancy Whitney, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Richard Whitney

Melt DRY "TIGHT" SKIN INTO SUPPLE SMOOTHNESS

BRISK cool days to tempt you out of doors for hours at a time! No wonder your skin feels dry and "tight" when you come in . . . harsh to the touch.

What happens is that dying cells on the surface of your skin dry out quicker. They begin to shed.

But you can make it smooth and moist in a minute. By melting away those tiny rough particles—with a keratolytic cream!

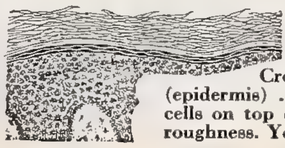
A dermatologist explains

A prominent dermatologist makes this clear: "When a keratolytic cream (Vanishing Cream) touches dried-out surface cells, they melt away. The underlying cells, moist and young, come into view. The skin immediately appears smooth and fine textured."

That's why Pond's Vanishing Cream is such a wonderful skin softener! More than a perfect powder base, Pond's Vanishing Cream, applied regularly twice a day, starts you toward a young, fine-textured skin.

For a smooth make-up—Before you put on make-up, film your skin with Pond's Vanishing Cream. It melts away flaky bits . . . leaves your skin smooth for powder.

Overnight for lasting softness—Every night, after cleansing, smooth on Pond's Vanishing Cream. It won't show, won't smear the pillowcase. It goes on invisibly—softens your skin all night through!



Why skin feels harsh
Cross-section of outer skin (epidermis) . . . showing how dead cells on top dry up, flake off, cause roughness. You can melt them off.

Frankly Foolish

satisfaction in it, especially when you're a celluloid actress. On the stage it is different. There you have the daily thrill of a job well done. In this business you have it only at previews."

Then, again, her amazing straight-forwardness regarding herself; her (is it madness?) ability to self-analyze: "At heart I'm lazy, full of dippy dreams, but always battling a nervous energy which I can't whip down, even though doctors warn me I should, if I want to live. Of course, dear, didn't you know? They tell me I'll be in a box in five years! I think, probably, they're right, too. I have nervous breakdowns as regularly as other people have colds. I had my first at fifteen. I'm always having them. I had one on the desert, on location with "The Gay Desperado." The doctor ordered me to bed one day, and I was up the next, working with a fever of a hundred and two. I went from 126 pounds to 108. But I had to work, had to be busy. I couldn't help it, couldn't stop myself. Cooped up in a room I really would go crazy. That would be ducky, wouldn't it?"

I guess that's enough to show you what I mean. With Ida as a subject, an interviewer just doesn't know where to begin. Never on guard, she talks always in headlines. Never still, mentally or physically, she leaps briskly about, from chair to chair, from subject to subject. Pinning her down, translating her warm vital youth and energy into cold black and white type is practically an impossibility. But here, let me see what I can do about it.

I FOUND her, in a pair of glove-tight white shorts and shirt, stretched full-length on her living-room divan. On a small table was a tray of food, only half touched. On the floor was an open copy of "Lust for Life," the biography of Van Gogh. Across one arm of the sofa was a writing pad, with Ida's pencil pressed against it. Ida was asleep. Bee had let me in. Bee is her companion, hairdresser, secretary, maid, everything combined. Bee was wearing a pair of comfortable house pajamas. Bee said "Hey!" and Ida woke up.

Now I ask you. And if you had interviewed as many lady stars in as many elegant homes as I have, you would know why I ask you! It was marvelous! No customary wait, no planned entrance. No butler moving on cat soles. Just a "Hey!" and Ida woke up. What's more she rubbed her eyes and got mascara in them. Then she offered me some candy which turned out to be of a particularly caramelly kind; we each took a hunk. So, with one eye weeping, and two jaws chewing, we began!

In addition to her utterly frank views on the three subjects which I have already quoted above, I also discovered that Ida has always been afflicted with her present mania for doing and being and saying things to the point. Even at the sapling age of thirteen she was not content to think of the things she would do in the someday-future when she grew up. She wanted to do them then. Born with some four hundred-odd years of theatrical tradition in her veins, she naturally was destined to be an actress, but nobody expected it to crop out in her at such an unripe age.

Still, on her thirteenth birthday, Ida showed the restless energetic stuff of which she was made by announcing that she was through with school and that she was going on the stage. This announcement naturally met with no little opposition from her famous acting father, Stanley Lupino. Thinking that he was offering her an insurmountable barrier, he said, "Very well, if you can land yourself a part by noon tomorrow, without trading on my name, you may have it. If not, you will return to school for four more years. You understand these terms? You accept?"

"I accept." No quibbling, no asking for a more reasonable length of time. Undaunted.

That was mid-afternoon. By the end of the afternoon Ida had uncovered one part for an immediate production which looked promising. It was the part of "a maid, about twenty"—not a big part, but the size of the part made no difference to her then or now. Early the next morning she arrayed herself in her mother's too-large clothes which made her look tall, thin and haggard, all of the twenty years which she was not. Then, using the name Ida Ray, she went to see the actor-manager and won the role.

For sixteen months she played it, as Ida Ray, on a small salary, her real identity unknown. For sixteen months she played matinee and evening performances and attended the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art in between times. Then, accidentally, a letter addressed to her by her right name was discovered in her make-up box, and the secret was out. Delighted to find so illustrious a theatre name right under his nose, the manager could not resist taking her out of her present part and giving her a bigger one in another production. Pictures soon followed and so, at fourteen, Ida was playing leading ladies.

But all this too-early activity was bound to have its bad effect. A year later Ida was faced with the first of those breakdowns to which she refers. Calling off her contracts, she packed a few belongings and went off by herself to Italy, the country from which her ancestors had been driven because of political affiliations many years before. They became strolling players. Overwrought and tired as she was when she went there, the gentle Italian voices soon rested and soothed her, and it was from them that she gleaned her first feeling for music. Soon she was learning to sing and play, too. Piano came easiest to her and she spent many hours every day practicing. Most important of all, she began to compose!

As it was a life-saver then, so it has been during every trying period of her life. There was the period that followed her arrival in Hollywood, when she found herself with a five-year contract at Paramount, but with nothing to do. As she tells it herself: "I don't know what they expected, but when I arrived here they seemed shocked to find me so young. I think they even doubted that I had played leading roles abroad. One executive said, 'You should be posing for baby food ads, not as a leading lady for pictures!' Nothing I could do or say would change their opinion. So for months they just paid me to grow up. It was awful! As I look back on it now I don't know how I stood it.

"I used to go to the front office and beg them to give me some sort of job in the production department. I didn't care what—just so I could work—that was important. But no, all I ever had to do was pose for advertising tie-ups, in lingerie mostly. I even did that gratefully, for a while, until I realized that it was creating a wrong impression about me. Everywhere they were referring to me as a 'second Mae West'—not that I don't admire Miss West; I do. But I felt I had something else to offer, without being just a 'delectable dish', which was a phrase a columnist used in describing me.

"So again I had to turn to music, to fill my time. I composed a lot of things during those months. Not for publication, but just for my own peace of mind. At that time I even thought of organizing a girls' band and touring the country, and I would have, too, if something hadn't happened. Fortunately, it did!"

THAT something was, first, a fairly good part with Gary Cooper in "Peter Ibbetson," then a totally different kind of role in "Anything Goes." Then Ida played opposite Francis Lederer in "One Rainy Afternoon." And now one with George Raft. "Yours for the Asking." The latter, she feels, is the best chance she's had so far. "Because the girl I play is a horrible character. She talks out of the side of her mouth and is drunk practically all through the picture. I like mean roles. Best of all I like roles in which I can look awful, be awful. I don't care a fig about being pretty-pretty on the screen. There's one role I want to do more than anything—that's the part of the cheap little cockney girl in 'The Light That Failed.' Paramount wanted to borrow Bette Davis for it, but she was afraid it might be too much like Mildred of 'Of Human Bondage,' so I may get it after all. I'd rather play the meanest character part than the most entrancing ingenue.

"Do you see what I mean about having personally to be a little bit crazy in this business, to prevent the business from making you that way for good? Why, if I had to think, eat and sleep shop all day long, I really would be goofy. A lot of people do out here, you know; they go what I call career crazy. Making movies is all they ever think. In self-preservation I've had to develop a sense of humor about interests—music, writing, reading. And I've had to develop a sense of humor about this acting business. I've had to learn to burlesque it in my own mind. Why, Louis and I, and the whole family too, are always making fun of ourselves, as actors and actresses. Caricaturing ourselves You should take a peek at us some evening about five-thirty. The scene may go something like this . . ."

Through her eyes I saw the following: it was five-thirty and Ida returns from the studio. Louis Hayward, her best beau, is already there before her, hiding a bunch of posies in the hall closet. As he hears her at the door, he dashes to a corner chair, sinks down in a position of despair, head forward on hands, hair pulled forward over eyes. Ida comes in, strikes a dramatic pose, declaims: "You, too, my friend? Oh, this business, it will drive me mad! Mad, mad, mad, do you hear? So tired, they work us like slaves, eh Tiddledewinks?"

From the corner, head still down, eyes still covered: "Talk to me not in foolish rhymes, my lady. I am tired to death of it all! Whither shall we go—away from this wretched place? Name the place, my fair one . . . and thither will I take thee. 'One touch to her hand, one word to her ear, they reached the hall door, and the charger stood near. We are off—we are off—we are off,' I forget the rest—said young Lochinvar!"

"We are off," says Ida, "to the roller coaster races!"

And believe it or not, that is exactly where they are off to . . . to Venice or Ocean Park, where they ride on the Sky High or the Devil's Dip, screeching, laughing, yelping . . . now in the front seat, now in the back, now in the middle. Their romance began on a roller coaster. That's where it progresses.

I can see Ida's point. A little bit of foolishness goes a long way in keeping one from becoming too deadly serious. We are an emotional lot—four hundred years of emotion has naturally made us that way—and we do get upset easily. We cry, fret, fume and laugh easily. But being silly now and then minimizes that. It's our greatest outlet, you know what I mean, it keeps us from throwing vases!"

AND speaking of emotionalism, Ida tells this one on herself. "Several years ago in London I went to see Francis Lederer in 'Autumn Crocus.' Most of the play was quite gay, but the ending was so sad, and as the last curtain found Francis Lederer grief-stricken and in tears on the stage, so it found me in the same condition, in the audience. Only I think, if anything, my eyes and nose were redder. Anyway I went backstage to congratulate him. I had never met him, but that didn't matter. The tears were still pouring down my cheeks as I came face to face with him at the door to his dressing-room. 'Oh, Mr. Lederer, I enjoyed it so much! (Sniff, sniff.)'

"And he: 'I'm so glad you (sniff, sniff, blow) enjoyed it!' It went on like that for at least three minutes, both of us drowning our own words in our tears. But that isn't the end of it, there's a sequel. After I had come to America, I saw him do the same play again in Hollywood. And again I was crying and so was he when I went backstage to see him. A funny thing—after all those months and across one ocean and a continent—he remembered me. 'Still crying?' he asked tearfully. I nodded, too choked to speak. The leaping Czech and I are a lot alike, I guess."

M-G-M promises to release "Tarzan Escapes" any year now (it's been in production for more than two years!). Maureen O'Sullivan, having her locks arranged by the studio hairdresser, was back on the set for retakes.

Incidentally, of Ida, Mr. Lederer once said to me: "She has more sex appeal than any actress I have ever worked with in pictures. She is just a child at heart but for some strange reason, on the screen, she portrays worldly emotions with the ease of a sophisticated woman of thirty! She is like an artist with every emotional color on her palette, within easy reach of her finger tips."

I think perhaps that last line is the best summation of Ida that you will find anywhere—every emotional color at her finger tips, and restless fingers that can't help dabbling. Artists are always considered a little daffy by the world, perhaps because they think so little of the world and of what the world may think about them. As George Bernard Shaw has said, "She is the only girl in the world as mad as I am. She is positively a mad genius!"

in mid-air two chubby fingers tightly squeezed together.

"And look at all he eats!" marveled Miss Temple.

It was more than clear that she felt greatly impressed. For, to her mother's dismay, and to Shirley's unbounded delight, instead of existing on spinach, Bill Robinson actually eats four quarts of ice cream a day!

He told me his breakfast consists of vanilla ice cream plus several hot biscuits. The main course at lunch is ice cream, and after an ample dinner of appetizer, soup, steak, fresh vegetables and salad, comes more ice cream.

And it doesn't hurt him. Even his doctor, a New York one, in the East Seventies, is unable to account for this phenomenon.

BILL ROBINSON, going on sixty years old, is in the best of health, and has been consuming, daily, those four quarts of vanilla ice cream as far back as he can remember. Of course, this pleasing information cemented the amazing friendship which exists between Shirley Temple and Bill Robinson; a friendship that, for sincerity, loyalty and honest worship, outdoes any Hollywood has ever seen.

A mere mortal who can eat four quarts of ice cream a day, eat it and not only survive, but thrive, is a super human being as far as Shirley is concerned.

And Bill said to me, "Shirley Temple is the sweetest little thing I've ever met. If you once get me started talking about her I'll just talk for a year."

It was apparent that he had no time to talk for a year because, at that moment, in his living-room were seated Jesse Owens and Ralph Metcalfe plus five others from the Olympic team. They were waiting for some of Mrs. Robinson's fried chicken, for Bill was dining them before they sailed for Berlin.

He is tremendously interested in runners. Shirley Temple knows this.

"He won a championship, too," she brags. "The only running backwards championship!"

She neglects to add that it also is an uncontested one!

Bill Robinson and I sat in his den in the Robinsons' Harlem apartment. The walls of this room are completely hidden under a blanket of autographed pictures; a photograph of Franklin D. Roosevelt, Rudy Vallee, Joe Penner, Freddie Bartholomew, Marilyn Miller, Katharine Hepburn, Mae West and James Cagney, an early one of Eleanor Powell and one of Fred Astaire. On each is inscribed a tribute to Bill Robinson as a person and as an artist.

But I noticed that for every photograph hanging on those walls, there hang two of Shirley Temple. I saw a picture of Shirley standing in one of Bill's shoes, one of her presenting him with a watch, and another of them writing a letter together, and so on and on.

In the living room there is a striking absence of photographs, except for a silver-framed one of Shirley and Robinson which stands upon a small table, and looking down from the mantel is a dainty miniature of Shirley in a blue poke bonnet.

SHE calls me Uncle Billy," he said proudly. "And I'll never forget the first day I met her. Buddy De Sylva, the producer, took me to her dressing-room bungalow and introduced both Mrs. Robinson and myself to Mrs. Temple. Shirley just sat there very quiet. After some discussion Mrs. Temple said, 'Well, Shirley, here's your teacher,' and Shirley, she jumped right up and ran over to me and said, 'I'm very glad to know you.'

"After that the two of us walked across the lot. She kept reaching for my hand, but I just walked along, not seeing this until Mrs. Robinson called my attention to it, and from then on we always walked around, hand in hand.

"We made two pictures together, and I taught her the dances in her last one—'Bowery Princess,' which I think will be her greatest. She does six dances and five or six songs. She's on that screen from start to finish, and does wonderful imitations of Uncle Tom and Simon Legree.

"She learns her steps quickly," he told me. "We had all her routines set in less than a week. She learned the steps so fast she was three weeks ahead of the picture! And it isn't so easy to learn a new routine. Why, one of them alone, has as many as ten new steps; none has less than eight, and the waltz clog I taught her has nine.

"When I'm teaching her, we're together from ten until twelve in the morning, and after lunch until five.

"And not only does she learn her own lines, but she knows everybody else's! If anyone forgets his lines she prompts him.

"Once we were playing a scene where Shirley and I walked, hand in hand, in the woods. At a certain spot she was to turn. She couldn't quite get it. It was difficult to find the spot. So I said, 'I'll tell you what, I'll just squeeze your hand when we get there.' After that the scene went off fine. But the very next day when I slipped up on a line, she quickly whispered the right words to me, then laughed and said, 'Now we're even!'

"I'm always afraid of forgetting my lines, so I've gotten into the habit of mumbling them to myself, over and over, until it's time to take the scene. So one day she said to me, 'Don't keep saying those lines of yours so much, Uncle Billy, for when it does come time to shoot the scene, you're bound to miss up on them!'

SHE certainly is the smartest little thing. Yet she's smart without being smart-alecky. And that's a large order. I'm sure, when she grows up, instead of petering out, like most juvenile stars, Shirley Temple will become one of the greatest actresses in the world. That child," here Bill Robinson shook his head, as he grinned a grin that stretched from ear to ear, "why, she can do anything, just anything at all. You ought to see her play checkers. She beats everyone on the lot.

"She has another game she loves. She calls it 'Squares.' You draw a dozen parallel lines on a sheet of paper, and you take turns connecting them. You write your names across each square you make, and the one who makes the most squares wins. Shirley is a champion at this. No one has ever won a game from her.

"Instead of being spoiled, which would only be natural, she is uncommonly thoughtful. When I was laid up in the hospital she came to see me every single day, and she wheeled me in my chair, up and down the corridors. That hospital wheel chair fascinated her. I think she kind of hoped to get a chance to be wheeled around herself."

We talked about their future plans. "I'm returning to the Coast in a couple of months," he said, "to make three more pictures with Shirley.

"You know, I wanted to come East for the Joe Louis fight, but we were working on 'Bowery Princess,' so I said to Shirley, 'I want to go to the fight and if you learn your steps in time, I can go.' She said, 'I'll be good, Uncle Billy, I'll learn.' 'Remember, if you don't, then I can't go to the fight.' I told her. And she learned in record time. I guess if I had left before she finished, it would have pretty near broken her heart."

He paused a second. "I gave her a bracelet, and a little automobile. I had it regulated so it can't go faster than nine miles an hour. She drives it herself all over the lot.

"She gave me this watch," he added, proudly showing me a beautiful modern designed watch, on which was engraved 'Uncle Billy from Shirley Temple.'

"I suppose this sounds kind of conceited to say," he remarked while I studied the watch, "but honest, she worships the ground I walk on." His face beamed.

It is such a good face. And although Shirley Temple is a star, and in that capacity had plenty of opportunities to see the patience and goodness of Bill Robinson, she isn't the only child who has just cause to "worship the ground I walk on."

In New York City, up Harlem way, where the heat beats down mercilessly all summer, and the children have no place to play, he built a playground. It is opposite the apartment house in which he lives. He walked me to a window overlooking the cheerful square with its sandpiles, freshly painted swings, and chute-the-chutes and see-saws.

"It used to be nothing but an old lot that had everything in it from empty tin cans to dead dogs. Now look. . . ."

I looked, and I saw happy children, shouting, laughing, thanks to Uncle Billy.

Then, suddenly, I knew the real secret of his friendship with Shirley Temple. It was due to more than being the biggest ice-cream eater in Hollywood. It was the kind quality which is so much a part of Bill Robinson, the quality of goodness that never fails to go straight to the heart of a child. And Shirley Temple, call her what you will, genius, actress, dancer, singer or star, is still principally—a child. And you can't fool a child. You have to be the real thing. Bill Robinson is all of that.

Mr. Arliss seems to make films in England exclusively these days. Here's a scene from his latest, "The Nelson Touch," with Rene Ray. Rene is the gal who made such a hit in "Passing of the Third Floor Back."

"Women Are Trouble"

anyone ask a man to pose for some leg art so that every magazine and newspaper in the country is plastered with it? No! Does anyone ever do 'fashion lay-outs' of men? Not unless they want to get laid out by the man in question. Does any Gable get his face on the covers of the magazines? Hardly ever.

"When I'm doing a scene with a girl on the set and even though I may be saying the most significant lines in the whole picture and would be glad if my mug could show so that I might help the words along by an intelligent gleam in the eyes—whose back of the head does the camera man focus on? Mine!

YOU see," said Stu, "women are real trouble because they've got Nature on their side. They've got all the aces. They can be different women every day of their lives if they use their ingenuity enough. They've got the—uh—legs and the hair and the ability to arrange it a thousand different ways. They have the clothes, an infinite variety, whereas us men have but one suit of clothes that looks like any other suit of clothes and a hair-cut that always looks the same and no one seems to care about our legs!

"I was born in Squaw Valley, here in California, you know. Squaw Valley, how do you like that? Then we went to live on a forty-acre peach orchard. A peach orchard . . . and when the peaches were ripe for picking a bunch of girls and fellows used to hire out to us and pick 'em and, doggone, if the peaches that did the picking weren't more ructions and trouble than the peaches that were being picked. They were always having 'heart' troubles or something and the folks had to take more pains seeing that they didn't get bruised one way or another than they took with the fruit itself. And still and all, they picked faster than the boys did. Even up a tree they had the fellows licked.

"I once wanted to be a newspaper man. Well, I've had my wish—in many pictures, anyway! I went to the University of California back in 1922, intending to major in English and journalism. But after one year I had so much difficulty getting the courses I wanted that I decided to use my college money to learn how to act. I enrolled at Egan's Dramatic School in Los Angeles and after four months I was given a chance to substitute in 'White Collars' without pay.

"I'd got the yen for the stage doing some college plays. I'd also decided that even in the newspaper game women are trouble. They get better breaks than men, when they get 'em, and get 'em easily. They use their feminine wiles and ways and big strong cops pass 'em in where male reporters never get and they not only pass 'em in, they protect them also. I knew that I could never scoop a woman without feeling like a big bearded brute.

"It took a George Sand to be dramatized in plays, written up in more biographies and letters and memoirs than most of the big men put together. There have been a good many grand actors, but the names of Sarah Bernhardt and Ellen Terry mean more to the theatre world than any defunct male mummer. Now, today, Katharine Cornell is called The First Lady of the Theatre. I can't think of any man who is her running mate, exactly. And the supremacy of Garbo is unchallenged by my inferior sex. There isn't a scenario writer in the industry that tops Frances Marion. The name of the saint that comes most readily to my mind is that of Joan of Arc. Queen Elizabeth and Queen Victoria stand out more preëminently than any other remembered royalty. For every Lindbergh there seems to be an Amelia Earhart. For every Monsieur Curie there is a Madame Curie. Everyone knows the old 'power behind the throne' legends. There was probably plenty of trouble back of those thrones! More men have done things, of course. But I'm kinda afraid that that's only because more women haven't tried.

DIFFERENT types of women are different kinds of trouble," grinned Stu. I've played in pictures with a lot of different types and I've got 'em all figured out. I'm only using them as symbols for what I mean, of course. Nothing personal. Not too personal.

"I once played in 'The Magnificent Lie' with Ruth Chatterton. Most men haven't much subtlety. I know that I haven't. I believe that when someone tells me black is black they don't mean that black is white. But Ruth can handle words like Napoleon handled armies. When it comes to books, music, travel and diplomacy I've yet to listen to her equal. Then, just when you think comfortably, 'Oh, well, all these things are part of a woman's game, she comes along and turns aviatrix and proves that a woman can be all the things a man can be and do all the things a man can do. And if that doesn't put us at the bottom of the deck, what does?

"A girl like Jean Parker is another kind of trouble. She's so sweet, so gentle and so young that she's more formidable than a man armed to the teeth. The milder and sweeter they are, the more trouble they are. For what, will you tell me, can a mere man do against a girl like some kind of spring flower? If you happened to be working with Jean in a picture, if any question of one or the other getting the breaks arose, if a chance to do a bit of scene-stealing fell on your head you'd have to shove it off, wouldn't you? You couldn't be a big brute and take anything away from a defenseless child.

"Girls like Jean Harlow, Carole Lombard and Claudette Colbert—you can't expect mere men to talk back to them, to deny them anything they may set their hearts on. Even when they are wrong no man would have the heart to tell them they were anything but right.

"The only time," said Stu, "that women are not trouble is when they are wives. But if they are wives and careerists at one and the same time they are double-trouble. I know, from personal experience. When June and I were first married and before June decided that the babies and her home and me, I guess, were more important to her than her career, she made a few pictures. One time while she was working Stu Junior caught a cold. Well, what good was June on that set? She was torn in two. Half the time her mind was on the lines she was speaking and more than half the time on whether the drops were being put in the baby's nose. She had one foot off the set before the last camera had stopped grinding.

"I always hoped that June would give up the screen. Of course I wouldn't have tried to force her—"

And as Stu spoke I remembered a conversation I'd had with June a few days before. It wasn't for publication, but somehow I'm sure June wouldn't mind my writing it. It gives such a revealing picture of Stu Erwin as he really is, as his wife knows him, after working with him in pictures, after five years of marriage, after the birth of two babies . . .

She said, and her blue eyes were lovelier than they ever were in any love scene on the screen, "I'm so terribly happy." When she said that I thought to myself, "That's all that ever needs to be said or printed about Stu Erwin, really. That says it all." When you see him on the screen and remember that his wife said, "I'm so terribly happy," you'll know the real Stu Erwin better than any words of mine can make you know him.

JUNE went on, "We have such good times together, Stu and the children and I. Stu is so real. That's why I fell in love with him, you know. I fell in love with him the very first time I ever talked to him. I'd seen him about the studio quite a bit and we were working together in 'Dude Ranch' and I thought he was nice. But the very first day he ever asked me out to lunch I knew that—well, that it was love—and so real and so satisfying that everything and everyone else in the world seemed unimportant.

"Stu doesn't play the great lover roles, but he is one. I don't think there could be a more loving lover than Stu. He always remembers every little anniversary we ever shared. The time, the place, the day and the hour of our first luncheon together. The first time we went out to dance, where it was and what music they played. If anything, Stu overdoes the little, lovely things. A little while ago we had our Wooden Wedding Anniversary—our fifth, you know. And Stu went all over the city until he found a little wooden wrist watch for me as an anniversary present. No one but Stu would ever have thought of a wooden wrist watch.

"Last Christmas it was a new car—a town car, just for me. In the morning all of the presents were wrapped and under the tree and there was a tiny box for me, with a card in it, reading, 'Mommie dear, your present is too big to go under the tree. It's in the garage!'

"Stu always notices everything I have on. I can't wear a new flower in my coat that he doesn't speak about it. In fact, he always goes shopping with me. I'd never buy a gown, a coat or a hat unless I had Stu's okay on it.

"I don't think," said June, her eyes soft, "that you could find an enemy of Stu's anywhere in the world. He has more friends than any person I have ever known. I've never known a man to be as beloved as he is.

"Why shouldn't I give up any idea of working? Perhaps our life would seem very quiet and uneventful to many people. But Stu makes every little thing so joyous and important. The baby's new tooth, Stuart Junior's first swimming lesson, the dinners we cook together on cook's night out. He has such a faculty for making daily living vivid and real and fun that I don't need a career—I've got one! He's at home with the children and me all the time when he isn't actually working. He doesn't belong to clubs. He doesn't go off and play golf. He's raising dogs now, Scotties. And he has his camera, he takes hundreds of feet of film of the children and me—and I've never been a prouder leading lady," said June laughing "than I am when Stu photographs me with Stu Junior and little June as my supporting cast."

When she learned this story would be called "Women Are Trouble," June laughed and said, "Of course, Stu will say women are trouble, poor darling. He is so kind and gentle of heart, he is always afraid of them. He really admires us more than we deserve, I am afraid. He's a very great gentleman, my Stu—a very great gentleman."

Hand-Me-Down Gretchen

sisters. When a nun asked her what her ambition was when she grew up, she stated plainly, "To have a new blue dress without any mendings on it!" That, I guess, tells the story as succinctly as anything.

Once when she was only five, however, she left the convent for one evening to dance at a benefit. It was at that benefit that Mae Murray, also performing, took a great interest in Gretchen, and, seeing her on several occasions afterward, begged to be allowed to adopt her. But Mrs. Young would not hear of it. Hard-pressed as she was, with three girls and a boy to support, she still knew that somehow, some day, she, herself, would manage to give Gretchen the education and luxuries that Miss Murray offered. Nevertheless, Miss Murray did pay for Gretchen's dancing lessons for six months.

That in a way was a slight turning point in little Gretchen's life. At last finding some expression, she ceased to feel quite so useless, and began to develop a personality of her own. It was slow building, but steady, and by the time she was eight she had broken out in all sorts of mental rashes. One consisted of a heavy foot-stamping, whenever she was told to do anything, and an accompanying, "I won't do it! Nobody can make me do it!"

She also adored to break rules. One rule, which turned out to be her Waterloo, required all children to turn in any cake or candy brought or sent from home. These sweets were to be apportioned to them in small quantities each day. On one occasion Gretchen withheld a large chocolate almond bar and gloatingly set out to eat it—all of it—in bed. Unfortunately, she fell asleep in the midst of her deviltry. The chocolate melted all over the sheets, pillow, her face and nightgown, a dead giveaway in the morning. For three hours Gretchen had to stand in the gloomy hall alone.

But even that progress—and it was progress for a retiring girl of her type—

LOOK OUT FOR THE "COMMON COLD"!

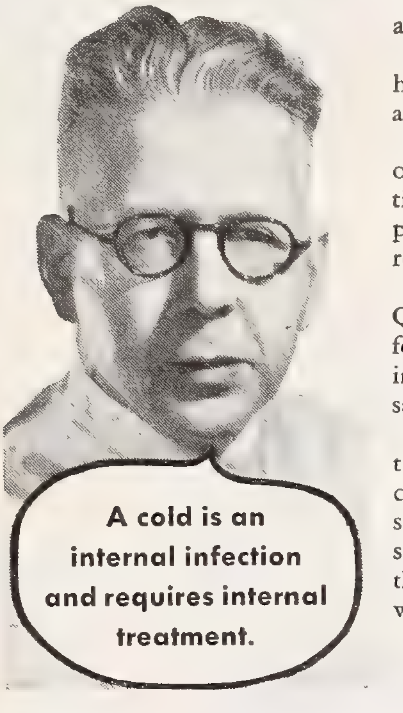
The "Common Cold" is the Common Forerunner of Pneumonia and Other Serious Diseases!

The Sensible Thing in Treatment

How often have you seen it—a cold today and something worse tomorrow.

Almost every case of bronchitis, bronchial pneumonia and influenza has its start in the "common cold."

According to recently published figures, there is a death every four minutes from pneumonia traceable to the "common cold."



A cold is an internal infection and requires internal treatment.

A menace to life and health, the "common cold" is also a severe tax on the public pocketbook. Statistics prove that the average person loses ten days' work a year on account of colds.

Something to Watch

If there's anything you want to watch, it's the "common cold." Health authorities on every side urge it.

Don't take any cold lightly. Don't try to laugh it off. The cold that may be only a sneeze or a sniffle today may be a bed case tomorrow. Regard a cold seriously. Treat it for what it is—an internal infection.

As an internal infection, it is patent that a cold requires internal treatment. Mere surface measures—mere local treatments—may temporarily alleviate the symptoms, but to get at the real trouble, you must get at a cold from within.

An excellent thing to take for a cold is Grove's Laxative Bromo Quinine.

Fourfold Effect

First of all, Grove's Laxative Bromo Quinine is expressly a cold tablet and not a preparation good for a number of other things as well. It has only one purpose, the treatment of colds.

Secondly, it is internal in effect and does four definite things of vital importance in the relief of a cold:

(1) It opens the bowels, an admittedly advisable step in the treatment of a cold.

(2) It checks the fever in the system.

(3) It relieves the headache and fever.

(4) It tones the system and helps fortify against further attack.

A fourfold treatment, in other words, Grove's Laxative Bromo Quinine accomplishes definite and speedy results.

Grove's Laxative Bromo Quinine imposes no penalty for its use. It contains nothing harmful and is perfectly safe to take.

Grove's Bromo Quinine tablets now come sugar-coated as well as plain. The sugar-coated are exactly the same as the regular, except that the tablets are coated with sugar for palatability.

Don't Procrastinate

When you feel a cold coming on, do something about it right away. Don't dally, don't compromise. Go right to your druggist and get a package of Grove's Laxative Bromo Quinine.

Start taking the tablets immediately, two at a time. Usually, if taken promptly, Grove's Bromo Quinine will check a cold in 24 hours—and that's the action you want for safety!

All drug stores sell Grove's Laxative Bromo Quinine. When you ask for it, insist upon getting what you ask for. The few pennies' cost may save you a lot of anxiety.

was lost when she eventually left the convent for home. Not that her sisters were ever in any respect cruel to her—it was just the old, old case of the too-adoring younger one. And as is only natural in any family, the older girls were getting all the favors. It was Polly Ann and Sally who were registered with all the studio casting officers, finding their place in the world, and Gretchen who stayed at home.

Then there were the little things to add to the general hopelessness of it all. Polly Ann's legs, for example. Whenever Gretchen and the girls used to go to the beach, Gretchen always sat on her legs because they weren't full or nicely rounded like Polly's. They were, she felt, scrawny and thin in comparison. Little did she think that someday studio photographers would find those same legs the answer to a camera's prayer, so slim and lovely, with no muscle bumpiness to be retouched afterward. Just the same they were the source of no little worry to Gretchen at twelve.

There were a lot of things like that; cotton hose for her when the others wore silk, made-over cloth coats with cloth collars when the others had fur, dusting the parlor furniture when the others had dates!

A lot of girls would go on, through life, accepting this hand-me-down lot. And Gretchen Young might have done that, too, except for one thing. She did so want them to be as proud of her as she was of them. It preyed on her mind for months and months. What could she do to show them that she was admirable, too?

FINALLY her chance came. At a very dire moment in the Young's financial state, there came a work call from one of the studios for Polly Ann to come at once. Trembling, Gretchen hung up the 'phone Polly Ann, Sally and Mrs. Young were all downtown for the day—and she had no idea where to reach them. Plopping on her hat, she started out for the studio, gave her name as Polly Ann Young and found hersel in a picture.

That story, in essence, has been told before, but always Gretchen's motive has been misinterpreted. When Gretchen answered that studio call, masqueraded as her sister, the possibilities of a picture career of her own never occurred to her. She had no selfish desire to take Polly Ann's place in that picture; there was no personal strategy in her action. She was nobly going to her family's rescue. Fifteen dollars a day meant that many dollars more in the family's purse.

As wise men say, you never know when one little incident will change the course of your life. That particular episode turned out one of the screen's most promising young actresses. An actress with a long-term contract and a first big part in "Laugh, Clown, Laugh" with Lon Chaney. An actress whose name was Loretta Young.

As it was difficult to become accustomed to her new name, so it was difficult to become accustomed to her new station at home. As a matter of fact, Loretta has never quite become used to it. They still call out to her: "Hey, Gretch, do this will you?" "Hey, Gretchen, give me a hand!" And Loretta still obliges. Many is the time she has been known to get down on her hands and knees and scrub the bathroom floor "Because the maids are busy, and besides, because I like it. Good exercise. Great fun. Good for me, too, keeps my knees on the floor!"

Another thing, even since her stardom, Loretta has never once had a personal maid. The Gretchen still in her simply can't imagine it! Nor is she in any way "starrish" on the set. Unlike most stars who spend their idle time between scenes in their dressing-rooms, Loretta prefers to spend it on the set, satisfying her keen interest in every angle of production. Story, photograph, direction and sound recording all receive her avid attention. Like the Gretchen of old, she is still a keen movie fan and goes picture-chasing more than any other star in Hollywood.

Only in one respect has she changed—and that is in connection with clothes. The hand-me-down-Gretchen has given 'way to the most extravagantly dressed young actress in cinemaland. Clothes are her mania . . . closets and closets and closets of them, row on row, as numerous and colorful as the Flanders' Field poppies of that world-famous poem. Day after day she goes shopping, dress and hat browsing, all around the town. She's a familiar face to all the salesladies everywhere. As one of them says of her, "She is the only star I've ever known who will offer to share her fitting-room with another customer, if we're busy, and if the other customer doesn't mind." Can't you imagine her always saying, "If she doesn't mind, I don't. I'd be glad to have her."

Well, maybe she is still just Gretchen after all!

Love's Been Their Inspiration

with Raft, Virginia might have had a very opposite effect on him; she might have given him an inferiority complex; she might have made him self-conscious of his lack of polish. Instead, she inspired him to rub off the edges of whatever crudity of manner remained in his make-up. It is this type of inspiration that is most difficult for a woman to offer—and make a man see that it is inspiration and not condescension.

I CAN still remember the dither of excitement that fluttered through the Fox lot when the news got around that Dixie Lee "might marry that Crosby kid." There was excitement and chagrin because Dixie was then a coming star, and Crosby was known for his playboy antics. Yet twice since she has been in love with Bing Crosby, Dixie Lee has gone out of her way to inspire him to great accomplishment.

The first time was before they were married, when Bing loved her so much he would do anything she asked, except pass up a cocktail now and then. When she found that talking didn't have the desired effect, that threatening never to see him again had no effect, she took a long chance on losing him forever—she ran away from him. He couldn't bear the separation and did as she asked—he straightened out his affairs and began to work seriously.

Then, when it looked as though success was going to have a too-exhilarating effect, she settled him back to responsibility by giving up her own hopes of a career to have a family. The man doesn't live, who doesn't want to be a hero to his children. Dixie took this fact into consideration. She provided her husband with the inspiration to do better work that he might continue as a record-breaker at the box-office. A man who has the responsibility of a family can't afford to let down.

There seemed, for a time, as if Bing might slide along on past laurels. Dixie didn't nag. She quietly went about the business of fitting herself once more for a screen career, then she returned to pictures. It was a challenge, an inspiration, to Bing. He couldn't let his wife get ahead of him, and his latest pictures show how hard he tried to do his best.

You may rest assured that Dixie Lee Crosby isn't through inspiring her husband. When it begins to look as though Bing finds golf and fishing more important than his work, when it begins to look as though he is sliding back instead of going forward, she will search her fertile mind for new ways to inspire him.

There was a time, shortly after her marriage to Valentin Parera, when Grace Moore wanted to give up her career. She looked around her and saw marriages being broken for many reasons that might affect her own; the wife's career eclipsed that of the husband; the separations were too long and frequent; the wife did not know how to accept the public's adulation and still remain sweet and feminine and a good sport. All these things frightened her.

SHE suggested to her husband that perhaps it would be wise, since they were so much in love, to give up her career. She would be happy in his success, she said. But he would not hear of it. Rather, he encouraged her to go back to Hollywood and make the most of her golden opportunity. He is a brilliant man; he knows that success cannot always remain at the peak for either man or woman; and he looks forward to the day when both can retire gracefully from the public eye, to a private life entirely their own—and he is content to await that day. His attitude has been a source of constant inspiration to Grace Moore and, as a case history in this series, we recommend it to those husbands, in and out of professional life, who don't know what attitude to take toward their wive's success.

What Do You Do with Your Little Finger?

—when you pick up a glass or cup? . . . You know from watching others that charm and poise can be destroyed instantly by the misuse of hands. And by the same token, the correct use of your hands can become a tremendous social and business asset. Great actresses accomplish much of their poise by proper hand action.

The makers of Frostilla—the famous skin lotion that keeps hands, face and body smooth and lovely—asked Margery Wilson, the international authority on charm and poise, to tell

- how to hold a cigarette
- how to pick up cards
- how to shake hands
- and how to make hands behave to the best advantage on all occasions

Margery Wilson gives the authoritative answers to these and other questions in an illustrated booklet on How to Use Your Hands Correctly. Although this booklet is priced at 50c, we have arranged to present it without charge to Frostilla users in the United States and Canada until May 30th, 1937.

Just mail coupon with the front of a 35c, 50c or $1.00 Frostilla Fragrant Lotion box (or two fronts from 10c sizes) and your copy will be sent FREE.

has been to Joan Blondell makes one of the loveliest stories in Hollywood. When Dick met Joan she was slipping in her career. She was getting, excuse us for the ugly word, fat. Joan's hair wasn't beautiful or well-dressed any more; she seemed to have forgotten how to be lovely or smartly attired. Then Dick let her know that he adored her, and what a change took place!

Joan Blondell took stock of herself. Dick was young and smart-looking; she had to smarten up not to embarrass him when they went out together. She had to lose weight; it wouldn't do to acquire that matronly look while Dick remained slender and youthful. By the time Joan finished making herself over that she might be worthy of Dick—she had made herself over into one of the most attractive young girls in Hollywood. And by that time, also, her bosses saw the change and began to give her better parts and smarter costumes to wear.

AND now we have the case of Errol Flynn and Lili Damita. You could count on one hand the stage and screen successes of Mr. F. before his marriage to the vital Lili. She was the sought-after, ever-reported-engaged belle of the theatre and screen. Millionaires fell over one another for her smiles.

The Damita success was so firmly established in the theatre and on the screen that she had but to speak to get her wish for a certain part, a certain leading man, a certain play or story. But she knew that when two careers meet in marriage, one must be subordinated to the other, for a while at least, so that the beginner might get proper impetus. And because she was in love with Errol Flynn, Lili Damita, who had been called a tigress and a selfish woman by others, subordinated her own career to his. She saw to it that when publicity was to be gotten, her husband got it. She saw to it that in pictures he was the more prominent, in interviews he did the talking.

To a less successful, less in love woman, this would have been difficult. It might have resulted in ugly jealousy and nagging. But not in this case. Lili Damita was frank in her attitude; her husband was the boss; her husband was the great one of the combination. Where she might have crushed his career, she gave it incentive and inspiration. And if you've been hearing the rumblings of those divorce rumors, too, you'll know that something other than professional jealousy is at the root of a possible break-up.

We want to make a suggestion. If you're in love, chart the course of your association wth the person you love. See whether the graph indicates an upward trend in that person's life since you fell in love. And if it doesn't, read these case histories again—there may be inspiration in them for you.

mamas know, that they won't be sweet young things forever. They want to progress—to develop—from young roles to roles such as Norma Shearer and Claudette Colbert and Carole Lombard are playing. If Anita didn't take simple precautions against the march of time, that fragility would become downright peakedness. The luscious Olivia could easily acquire an overblown look as the thirties approach. Jean's gamin charm is backed up with real grace, with latent poise, for one can't be gamin eternally. And the little French girl's softly rounded face, which has that look about it (I think dewy is the word) must stay "softly" rounded and no more.

AND so—here are some rules, some do's and don'ts, for youth: Eat three good meals a day, but eat nothing in between meals, with these two exceptions: if you're a little on the thin side, drink a big glass of rich milk in the middle of the afternoon. You can have a malted milk, if you hate plain milk, but try to like the milk. And, you others, if you're outdoors a lot, or get dreadfully hungry for some reason, eat a piece of fruit in the middle of the afternoon and stay away from the corner drugstore.

Watch your pet appetite like a hawk! If you love sweet things, I am not the one to say that you should deny yourself moderate indulgence at this stage of your life. But let your indulgence come at the end of your dinner. Then eat a little candy in place of dessert, or have your beloved ice cream, or wheedle your ma into making your pet dessert—and eat one portion of it. Do not make a beeline for your favorite form of sweet when you're very hungry. Wait until the tum is satisfied with more essential foods and then top off the meal with the less desirable sweet. Then, too, always eat good sweets, when you must have them—home-made things, or good reliable bought ones. Not cheap, fancy looking but ill-prepared confections.

Remember that there are such things as calories after all and they'll count up by themselves, even if you don't bother to count 'em. So make up for indulgence in one thing by self-denial in another. If, for example, you have regaled your innards with your adored chocolate icebox cake for dessert on Monday, how about passing up Tuesday morning's cereal, or the cream or sugar (or both) in your coffee, or something like that?

Watch out if you have a predilection for highly seasoned foods. Don't pour Worcestershire sauce all over your steak. Go easy on all seasonings and stay away, if possible, from some which I'll name. Again, I say—if you're healthy and strong, there's no reason why you should not lap up a bowl of chili con carne once in a while; and if you find some meats, perhaps, flat, stale and unprofitable without a dash of hell fire, appease your taste in moderation. Again also, I say—balance your occasional indulgence by a virtuous, meatless, fresh vegetable dinner next day.

THE taste for highly seasoned foods grows on one like the taste for liquor, almost. Highly seasoned foods cause liver complaint and red noses in later years and bumps on the skin right now. Over-indulgence in them dulls the appetite to the point where a couple of honest eggs or a decent, self-respecting lamb chop tastes like nothing unless smothered in goo registering 104 degrees in the shade.

Here are some seasonings and such, commonly used in the average household, which make foods tasty and interesting and which are not harmful if indulged in moderately. Celery salt—use it occasionally rather than ordinary salt. Curry, thyme, bay leaf, paprika, sage, onion and onion juice. Ask for tarragon vinegar rather than cider vinegar, or use lemon juice. All of the sweet flavorings are okay, if sensibly used. Try brown sugar occasionally, for everything except beverages. I admit that in tea or coffee, it's pretty bad news, but it can be used, and tastes delicious, on fruit, in sweet sauces and frostings and when used in the preparation of desserts. Stay away, most of the time anyway, from pepper—black, white and red; from chili powder, tabasco, horseradish, and mustard. Go easy on the ketchup and the pickles.

I'm not a bad cook (says she bragging about herself) and while I have no intention of competing with the Modern Hostess which is so expertly managed by my friend, Marjorie Deen, I will offer to do this: I'll tell you, if you'll write me for such information, certain stunts which make foods interesting and palatable and which, at the same time, steer clear of the taboos which we must observe if we wish to keep our skins clear and our figures lovely.

ANOTHER rule for carefree youth: try to overcome any fussiness of appetite of which you may be guilty. "I can't eat this and don't like that" attitude. Naturally, we all have our likes and dislikes. Rare and wonderful is the person who can eat everything with relish. But I think it's a swell idea to try to like almost everything that's good for you. Instead of being faddy and queasy about food, adopt an experimental, a "try it once" attitude. The fussy folks are the ones who end up skinny and scrawny. They coddle their stomachs till everything but their pet foods give them indigestion—so they think.

Finally, the minute you notice any falling off in your looks, jump on it like a duck on a June bug. I almost crossed that sentence out, for it is the tendency of young people, sometimes, to imagine they're getting fat, or acquiring wrinkles or something when they're not. However, I'll let it stand. Use your eyes and common sense—not your imagination. If the new size sixteen seems tight in the hips, no buttered white toast and jam for breakfast. Thin wholewheat toast—one slice—with little butter and no jam. Your desserts will be fresh or stewed fruit, gelatine or sherbet. Eat less meat and none fried.

Keep an eagle eye on your skin. Make-up off every night before going to bed. Clean your face and make up freshly once during the day. Watch the corners of your nose, the crevice of your chin, the area across the cheekbones, the skin around the eyes. Careful, thorough cleansing keeps the first two danger spots from getting bumpy. If you refrain from applying a new coat of powder over an old coat, that will help a lot, too Any tendency toward dryness on danger spots three and four should be fought with nourishing cream worn overnight. Doctor occasional blemishes with a dab of any reputable ointment, after a thorough cleansing. Write for my Skin Routine No. 1 for young, good—or pretty good—skins. It won't urge you to spend your money on expensive preparations, I assure you. It divides your beauty preparations into three classes: necessary, nice-but-not-so-necessary, and entirely optional.

Now, what about exercise? The answer is yes. You should exercise all the time. There, there—save the exclamation points. This is what I mean:

This article is called "An Ounce of Prevention" and it means just exactly that. I want to prevent the necessity of your slaving to regain your good figure in later years by keeping it good right along. As you grow older, you will, maybe, put on a little weight—that's natural. If you have children, your hips may broaden a little—that's natural, too. But the slightly more matured figure that comes with the years is not to be feared. What is to be feared is a general going to seed—a slackening of the muscles—a bulging and spreading—the loss of the lovely bust line of youth. None of these evils is necessary, but all these evils can sneak up on the best of figures without one's realizing it. Good, firm stomach muscles; a trim, bulgeless appearance of the hips and rear; and that uplift look in front—these are the beauty marks of youth. Let's keep 'em.

Exercising "all the time" isn't nearly as terrifying as it sounds. It's like this: when you stoop to pick up something, make an exercise out of it. Knees stiff, as in the old, familiar toe-touching stunt. Stand lots of times when you could sit—especially after meals. Feet together, knees straight, stomach pulled in flat, and derriere pulled in, too, as if you expected a spanking. Head up and shoulders held back. And you don't have to look as if you'd swallowed a ramrod, either.

Sleep without a pillow—it's the best exercise there is for preventing a ducked-forward head.

Walk consciously—as if you were taking a test. Feet pointed straight ahead. Always—always keep pulling your stomach muscles in. Bye and bye, this will become as automatic as breathing.

When you're sitting in a straight-backed chair, sit all the way back in it, shoulders and fanny touching the chair back. If you bend forward, bend from the hips, not from the shoulders. Remember that it's pretty difficult to have a straight back and a drooping bust line.

And here are two formal exercises also, in addition to the informal ones noted above: Stand by an open window and do the swimming breast stroke with your arms. Bring them up in front, shoulder height, palms together. Now out to the side, slowly, turning your palms back. Inhale on these two movements. A good inhale. Exhale as you let your arms down. Repeat ten times each morning.

The EYES that had to have "IT"!

After meals, this is a good stunt. Go stand against the wall, back to the wall, heels, buttocks and shoulders touching the wall. That makes you pretty flat in front, doesn't it? Look down at the old tum. Then see how much flatter you can make it. Hold the position for a few minutes and when you walk away and go about your business, endeavor to keep that same flatness.

Although this lecture has to do with preventing more than with curing, I mustn't neglect the young person with the knottier problems. The considerably overweight and underweight young ladies.

Youthful fat is apt to be of the "all over" kind. You seldom see a plump, young person—thank goodness—with hard hunks of fat, with those stubborn, hard deposits of flesh on hips and thighs. I have recommended the following diet to twenty-three plump youngsters I have known and I have been able to check on the fact that it has worked in each case. It's a vegetable, fruit and milk diet. It couldn't hurt an invalid, so it naturally can't hurt any hefty, healthy young girl.

Every vegetable except corn goes in the diet. Eat sparingly of beans and peas. Eat one baked potato a week. Be stingy with the butter. Eat all you want of leafy green vegetables. No cream sauces on anything, of course. No flavoring meats, Southern girls. I can't help it if they do taste pretty dreary. Eat all the raw fruit you like except bananas. Drink all the fruit juice you want. Stay away from meat, fish, eggs and starches—just try it for one month or six weeks and see if you aren't pounds lighter. Have your customary coffee or tea, but most assuredly without cream and without sugar, too, if you can. Drink one tall glass of skim milk every day, after your meal, or in the middle of the morning or afternoon. You can have clear soup—hot or jellied—too. It isn't as bad as it sounds, this diet. Remember, eat plenty of the foods on this diet. You can have a small mound of cottage cheese with your salads if you like it—no other cheese though. You shouldn't take salad dressing, though I'll permit a French dressing with a sparing quantity of olive oil.

A caution: Give up your customary ration of meat gradually. It isn't good to make too radical changes in one's diet all of a sudden. Just eat less and less meat over a period of a week, until you're not eating any. At the end of a month or six weeks, if you notice a really remarkable improvement in your weight, go back gradually to meat eating. But continue to stay away from cream and sauces, rich, starchy and sugary desserts.

The underweight young girl, please take to heart what I have said above about overcoming any fussiness of appetite. She should, also, strictly obey what I've said about highly seasoned foods. For breakfast, she should have fruit, cereal, toast and butter and a beverage. If she can manage a couple of eggs, too, that's fine with me. She should have that glass of rich milk in the morning or afternoon. For lunch she should have soup, salad, and a light dessert. In cold weather, she should have a hot course in place of or in addition to the salad. She should, in other words, eat two dinners, virtually, every day. It's better, in fact, if she eats her most substantial meal in the middle of the day. However, just because she's thin, she cannot eat a lot of candy and a lot of ice cream, or gorge to the exclusion of everything else, on the foods she particularly likes. She should partake of a balanced arrangement of fruits, vegetables, meats, starches, fats and minerals—the whole works.

If nervousness is causing the trouble, she must be in bed five nights a week at ten o'clock. She should cut way down on cigarettes and never touch liquor. She has two nights a week to go stepping—and the mornings after, she should, if possible, sleep late and have her breakfast in bed, perhaps. She should take warm, not hot or cold baths. If someone would give her a soothing rub before bedtime, it would be nice. She should have a warm drink—hot milk, or a malt drink—before going to bed, though if that strikes her as too, too nauseous, I'll settle for a glass of fruit juice. She should be outdoors as much as possible and she should take swimming lessons, for swimming is a swell developer.

I'm running short of space, but I still have room to tell you about a couple of things you can write for, if you need same. One is Skin Routine No. 1 for pretty good skins and Skin Routine No. 2, which is all about improving young skins which aren't good or even pretty good. The second is a personal exercise chart. Last month, I offered to plan a personal diet for you. Now we'll get busy on the exercises. Again, I need your help. If you have a recent snapshot of yourself which gives an accurate idea of your figure, could I have it? I can't send it back to you, so don't mail me anything you particularly cherish. If this isn't possible, try to give me as accurate a description of your figure faults as you possibly can. Don't exaggerate—and don't be guilty of understatement, either. You try to tell me exactly what you need, and I'll try to give you exactly what you want. A stamped, self-addressed envelope, please. A good-sized envelope, if I'm not being too particular. It's pretty difficult to cram a chart into a dainty little note-paper sized thing. The address is Mary Marshall, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y.

That grand comedian, Roland Young, returned to his native London to do "King Solomon's Mines" for GB.

Baa, Baa, Black Sheep

"wanna buy a dog, horse, cow, etc., changing the animal each night. Then, luckily, I hit on the duck. It got such a laugh that I decided to buy one for the act.

SO, I found Emily and adopted her. I've been more than a father to her—in fact, a whole darn family rolled into one. We were happy together, and even when our earnings increased, our mode of living remained simple. Home to us was wherever we hung our hats—that is until the movies came along with promises of gold. Before the ink had dried on the contract I was afraid we might rue the day, but away we went to Hollywood."

Those three, Joe, his wife and Emily were very happy. They liked California and working in pictures. It wasn't until the meanies began cutting down on Miss Emily's closeups, and got out long shears to hack away on her footage, that things began to change. At first she protested, as any girl would when "done wrong by," but when it was explained that it was all for Joe's good, Emily went right into the back seat and did her bits like a little major. For you know there's not a mean bone in all her feathered breast—in fact, there beats a heart of gold, and every beat is for Joe Penner.

"They seem to think my duck has typed me," Penner explained. "My new contract calls for a black sheep to stooge for me. Of course, I think it's a little coincidental, not short of an inference, that it should be a black sheep. Indeed, there may be something really personal in it."

However, there is the public to reckon with in this new venture of the black sheep, so naturally we felt Emily should have her say on the subject—sort of make an official statement to the press. But alas, poor Emily's exact whereabouts are still shrouded in mystery, and try as we might, we couldn't get to see her.

"Directly on my arrival in Hollywood," Joe informed us, "my sheep and I will pose for pictures. Of course, he will have a big handicap to overcome, taking Emily's place, but he's a very smart sheep and I'm sure he can make the grade."

Thus, in his own inimitable fashion, our lisping comedy man skirted the break between himself and his cast-off leadin' lady.

FROM now on, I make only four pictures a year, my first being 'Roaming Around,'" Joe went on to explain his future plans. "This is much better for me because the public tires of comedians when they see them so often. It also means that I'll get better breaks on stories as there will be more time to look for suitable scripts. I guess Eleanor and I will have a home of our own after all. It's been our ambition for years.

"This is the greatest opportunity of my career," Joe told us enthusiastically. "On October fourth I begin my new radio program, broadcasting from the coast. My new picture contract allows time for broadcasts, so I'm hoping to accomplish a lot in the coming year."

After meeting Joe Penner, we haven't much doubt that he will soon be one of the headline movie comedians, for he is a real personality and has turned every handicap into an attribute contributing to his success.

Anyone who can begin life in a small town in Hungary as a soprano in the choir of his grandfather's church, and come through to the garish amusement world entirely on his own is bound to succeed.

Joe feels that one of the most disheartening facts of Hollywood is that some of the most talented people don't get the break they should.

"For instance," he said, "there's little Frances Langford. She is a good actress and is even more attractive in person than on the screen. If they would only take a little time to direct her and learn to photograph her properly, she would be a real comer. Frances is a hard worker, so there will be no holding her down."

As the Century sped away with Mr. and Mrs. Penner on board our closing thoughts were in sympathy for Emily Duck as well as the little black sheep. However, we hope for the best, and console ourselves with the fact that we don't like duck soup and so will never be a party to Emily's departure in such a manner. As for lamb stew—well, it's a bit premature to worry on that score!

Norman Foster right under my eyes? The columnists kidded about it, but it wasn't so funny to me. Now the three of us go out, instead of just Sally and I as we used to.

"And, as I've already said, this isn't the first bit of jilting I've been up against. No, I'm serious when I say I'm not going to be married for a long time. Virginia Bruce? She talks about all the others when I take her to dinner. Yes, I'm sure a romantic flop when the cameras aren't grinding."

Well, if confession is good for the soul, Cesar Romero should feel just fine. What do you think? Our guess is that he's the "sudden elopement" type!

And last, but by no means least, is Columbia's single singing star, Michael Bartlett.

"Well," grinned Mr. Bartlett, "perhaps I shouldn't be in this line-up of males, for frankly, I'm not a bachelor by choice. I'm looking around for a wife. You see, I was going to be married once; in fact, said a tearful, temporary farewell to my sweetheart before leaving for Hollywood. She said she was going to wait, but she didn't say for how long. And she waited all right—just five months. Then she up and married my best friend.

"I was in the dumps for weeks and then decided to snap out of it. Here I was, I figured, out here among all the desirables in the world, and I couldn't find one to take my mind off the old gal. I couldn't find one, because I wasn't interested in looking. So I decided to make myself interested. And now, everything's on the up-and-up. I haven't found the girl, but I've found several of them who are nice and amusing and fun to be with. I'm not planning to be married this month or next, but the minute I feel like it, if she'll have me, I'll have her. She needn't be an actress, a secretary or a singer. There are no qualifications. All she's got to be is darn nice and care about yours truly." Which, you'll agree, is fair enough. And not such a strict requirement for the girls to meet!

That handsome Britisher, Brian Aherne, isn't too anxious to take the matrimonial step and his first and real reason for making haste slowly in this direction is his career.

"I've been on the stage practically since boyhood," he said on his most recent trip to New York, "and I've just lately arrived professionally. It's been a slow climb and I'm a firm believer in that famous old adage that 'he travels farthest who travels alone.'

"I may not be in pictures all my life though, and when and if the day comes when I turn to business affairs, that is the time I'll look for a wife, for that is the time when I'll have time to devote to a home. You see, there is nothing as fine as marriage when it is right; that is, with the right set-up, and nothing as disappointing when it isn't. Yes, while I'm still acting, I don't think it would be fair to think about marriage."

And so we have a list of the most eligible who will continue to be for some time, simply because they want to be, finances, opportunity and everything else most men lack notwithstanding.

about her, I felt that dignity might be a very good angle for the interview.

Escorted to the set of "Murder with Pictures," in which Gail's playing the lead, I plowed my way through a tangle of cables and lighting apparatus, finally running her to earth. It was one of the summer's hottest days, 95 in the shade, to be exact, but there, serenely smiling in a smart woolly winter outfit, with a long black cape and leopard-skin collar that came way up around her ears, sat our beautiful highbrow, looking as cool as you please! In one slender hand she held a cardboard container full of steaming hot coffee and in the other a cellophane bag containing two discouraged-looking sugar-buns. She looked exactly like a little girl at a picnic.

ONSLOW STEVENS arrived at her side at the same moment we did, and she promptly handed the food to him. He, in turn, refused to accept it. "But it's yours," she insisted. "You ordered it; said you were starving!"

"Oh, dear no," replied Mr. Stevens. "I couldn't think of taking it! Etc., etc."

"Oh, don't be silly," chirped the authority-on-dignity. "You know you want it and wouldn't be a bit polite about it if we didn't have visitors! He's only trying to show off, pay no attention to him!"

"Dignity?" echoed Miss Patrick in reply to my first question. "Oh dear, I wish I'd known in advance what you wanted to talk about. One's always rather lost just on the spur of the moment, like this. Besides, we're going to be interrupted every few minutes, I'm afraid. I'm in this scene that they're shooting and we'll probably be kept on it most of the morning. However, we'll try. What were we talking about? Oh yes, dignity!

"Of course, it goes without saying that dignity is highly essential to every woman's make-up—at times. At other times it definitely is not. It's a two-edged sword, and has to be handled very skillfully. In an unpleasant situation it's a grand 'out'; and of course there's no doubt that everyone has a lot more respect for a woman who is dignified than for one who is not, regardless of her other merits. Dignity's just another word for self-respect or refinement, isn't it? Certainly anyone having these two qualities is rarely lacking in dignity.

"If dignity isn't natural to a girl she should learn to create it, or simulate it, just as she learns to create the illusion of beauty, or glamor, or anything else she wishes to suggest. However, it's vastly important that she has the good sense to turn it off as well as on, and to use it in such manner that it becomes a quality instead of a nuisance. At times dignity is a woman's very best weapon; at other times it's her worst.

"In cultivating dignity, much depends upon one's type. For instance, if a girl is tall and statuesque she's simply got to be dignified, while if she's little she can be cute and cunning, with dignity brought out only when it's actually needed.

"Of course, dignity pays big dividends, yet it can also be very expensive in a material way Take the matter of clothes, for example. A tall girl can't wear any old thing; she should look extremely smart at all times—yet smart clothes cost a lot of money. The little girl can buy cute frocks for $6.98 and up. Then, too, the dignified type has to worry more about her figure; she can't ever let herself go on a good binge. If a little girl grows plump and roly-poly, she's all the cuter, but a big girl—brrrrrrrrh!

"Most modern women seem almost afraid to be thought dignified. They think they'll be classed as prigs and miss a lot of fun. That's because they've got the wrong idea of what constitutes dignity. They confuse it with repression. Being brought up in the South, I had the importance of being 'lady-like' dinned into my ears from infancy, but I don't think I ever lost any real fun in living up to it. As I said before, you must know how to use it. It's absolutely essential that the girl who's learning to be dignified acquire graciousness at the same time. Consider Kay Francis, Claudette Colbert, Myrna Loy. They are examples of dignity at its very best—yet no one ever thinks of any of them as prigs or spoil-sports. This is because of their invariable graciousness. Then there's Helen Hayes. She's a tiny girl, yet she has immense dignity, and charm enough for a dozen women!

As for an example of the dividends that dignity pays, consider Ann Harding. She's come through all her tribulations with the sympathy and highest regard of everyone, because of her superb dignity. If she had handled her difficult problem differently, if she'd forgotten her dignity for one moment and had resorted to mud-slinging and the tactics that some women would have used, no one would have cared a hoot what happened to her. As it is, we think she's marvellous!"

Gail's whole manner is a perfect blend of all we mean when we say "charm."

At this point, she was called for another "take." In this scene Gail was supposed to have come from a court trial, with Onslow Stevens and a flock of reporters in her wake. At the door, leading off-stage, she posed while they took a flashlight picture of her, looking oh, so dignified and sad. It was all very solemn until, just as she made her exit, Onslow Stevens gave her a push and yipped—"Not that way, you dope!" From behind the door I heard her giggling, "That was a 'take,' you poor nut, not a rehearsal! Now we'll have to do it over again!"

"I see what you mean about turning it off and on," I said when she came back.

"Yes," she laughed, "but I'm afraid you've come to the wrong place to learn about dignity. Everyone's haywire this morning—'specially me. Anyway, a motion picture set is a difficult place to practice dignity. If you take yourself too seriously it gets everybody down, including yourself. Moreover, a keen sense of humor is a saving grace at any time and should never be lost sight of."

She's right. I'm sure she's right about everything. Anyway, if she should run for Governor of Alabama, she'll get my vote!

"baby fat" but it can be just as unhealthy as any other kind of fat and although she is noticeably taller in each new picture, she will soon only be in line for roly-poly comic roles if she doesn't get thinner soon. It would be a shame to let her get so fat that a sweet child such as she is would have to be put on a rigid diet which would impair her health.—H. Park, St. Louis, Mo.

Yankee Booster

After reading an interview with Marlene Dietrich, one can readily understand the viewpoint of those who insist we should patronize our American stars. No one expected Miss Dietrich to like the United States better than her native Germany, but that is no excuse for her unwarranted criticism. Her remarks concerning American schools and men, to mention a few things, were simply obnoxious to one who is proud of an American heritage. Obviously, Miss Dietrich hasn't much respect for American intelligence either. Why should we support with our dimes and quarters, men and women who show their appreciation by making disparaging remarks about our country? From now on I intend to boost such grand stars as Eleanor Powell, Nelson Eddy and Robert Taylor (all Yankees) instead of exotic "knockers."—A former Dietrich fan, no address.

Bob Taylor Surprised Her

Recently I received one of the surprises of my life. Robert Taylor's picture came to me through the mail! Of course, there's nothing so unusual about receiving a star's photograph. All one must do is say a few nice things about his favorite star, enclose a coin, address and mail the fan letter. Sometimes you get a picture and sometimes you don't.

I wrote a letter to Mr. Taylor; very few things I said were praiseful. Almost everything was in the form of criticism. Still I got a picture and I didn't even send a coin for it. Even if he didn't see or read the letter, I give him credit for being one grand person. Wouldn't it be grand if there were a few more like him?—Mildred Ferderber, Madrid, Iowa.

A Line or Two from Lots o' Letters

"Monsieur Beaucaire" would be a natural for Nelson Eddy—music worthy of his voice and a powdered-wig role to satisfy those who prefer him in costume. How about it, M-G-M?—F. Wakeling, London, Eng. There are rows and rows of magazines on the newsstands and not a man's picture among them! How I would like to add colored photos of Gable, Taylor, Cooper and Raymond to my collection! Why not try it some time, MODERN SCREEN?—G. W., Sweet Springs, Mo. I do not like to see life in its true form portrayed on the screen. We can see poverty everywhere, so why pay to see it on the screen? It lifts the morale of the people to see lovely clothes and elaborate settings; the trouble is we see too little of wealth and too much of poverty.—E. A., Asheville, N. C. Is there a "blacklist" in Hollywood barring certain players from the screen for some unknown reason? If not, why is Gloria Swanson still waiting for a come-back chance? Every so often she is mentioned for a major production, but finally loses out to another actress.—G. A., Utica, N. Y. The attitude of certain stars toward the fans at previews is ridiculous. I never hunted for an autograph in my life, but I can sympathize with the youngsters who crowd around the stars, notebook in hand, waiting for at least a smiling refusal. When a star hurries through the crowd with a frown on her face, she mars everything the fans believe her to be. I don't think it is really conscious meanness, but it looks b-a-d. If it really annoys her so much there are two suggestions I might make. 1. To stay home from the preview. 2. To continue her screen acting right on into the foyer of the theatre and charge the strain up to professional duty.—E. Morrow, no address. Has it ever occurred to players that they "type" themselves? If they can excel in only one type of role, or if they go to such extremes in make-up that they can only be cast in one particular role, then, certainly, they must be typed. Some stars have such vivid and charming personalities that they cannot submerge them for any reason.—D. H., Helena, Montana.

Madden, a newcomer, to step into the star role and score, as every movie understudy does, a sensational success. The virtues of "Stage Struck" are the fact that it refuses to take itself seriously and the fact that Joan Blondell turns in a comedy performance which will surprise even the loyal Blondell followers. Dick Powell is his customary self as the dance director, and a first-rate supporting cast is headed by Frank McHugh, Hobart Cavanaugh, Craig Reynolds, Carol Hughes and Warren William.

Joan Blondell went temperamental with a bang for this role. The least temperamental of any actress on the lot, she's been waiting for a chance to get a crack at the other temperamental gals in town. Her characterization isn't based on any one of them in particular, but is a composite portrait of all the choice ones, according to Joan. Some of her off-screen portrayals were much better, we hear . . . This is Jeanne Madden's first professional appearance, never having been on the stage or screen before. Jeanne's from Scranton, Pennsylvania. She had opera leanings all through high school and upon graduation secured enough money for lessons from a New York teacher of note who brought her to the notice of studio talent scouts. She was given a screen test and a contract—but just on the Madden looks. The studio didn't know or care much about a voice to go with it. She proceeded to rest for three months while the studio forgot about her. Then news came that the Met would like to give Miss Madden a try. What, asked the studio, take away their songbird? As a result, she was given this role, and Miss Madden's headed for higher pay . . . The set of the New York Aquarium was one of the most interesting ever built on the lot. Experts studied the original so closely before attempting this set, that it is practically identical. In fact, some New York visitors happened on the set one day and claimed they recognized the fish . . . The Yacht Club Boys have one of the nicest set-ups invented. They are in frequent demand for moving pictures, but have declined any form of contract. So they do considerable cross-country travelling, and manage to hit both California and New York during the best seasons.

★★★★ Swing Time

(RKO-Radio)

This is the new Fred Astaire-Ginger Rogers musical opus—and that's all any reviewer need tell his readers. It has the standard Astaire-Rogers story, it has music by Jerome Kern and Dorothy Fields, and it has dancing. Most of the entertainment, as may well be expected, is confined to the dancing department. Miss Rogers' stepping becomes more and more expert with each new picture, and Mr. Astaire's fancy hoofing needs no recommendation whatever. He's still the tops, and anyone who doubts that has but to witness his "Bojangles of Harlem" number in which he dons blackface and turns out the fanciest stepping ever to appear on a screen. The story, sketchy and unimportant, has Ginger as an instructor in a "Learn to Dance" academy and Fred an unemployed hoofer. They form a dance team, fall in love, and you know the rest. Two of the songs are especially good—"This is a Fine Romance" and "Never Gonna Dance." "Waltz in Swing Time" is highly effective as danced by the two principals, and Astaire scores in a song number, "The Way You Look Tonight." "Swing Time" is better entertainment than "Follow the Fleet" and is probably the best Astaire-Rogers vehicle since "Roberta." An excellent supporting cast is headed by Helen Broderick, Victor Moore, Eric Blore, Betty Furness and Georges Metaxa.

★★★ Sing, Baby, Sing

(20th Century-Fox)

You can hardly call this a surprise hit with a cast headed by Adolphe Menjou, Alice Faye, Ted Healy, Patsy Kelly, Gregory Ratoff and the Ritz Brothers, but you can definitely call it one of the funniest musical pictures since the advent of talkies. To begin with, it's a pictorial chronicle of the widely publicized cross-country love flight of a well-known star of stage and screen and his alleged lady love. In the cinema version—or shall we call it coincidence?—Adolphe Menjou is a slightly alcoholic, Shakespearian screen idol who is convinced, by the manipulations of an alert agent, that Alice Faye is his Juliet. Alice is a blues singer related to the Capulets only through newspaper headlines, but when the agent puts her through her paces, "Sing, Baby, Sing" becomes pure hilarity every second of its unreeling. Highlights are Adolphe Menjou's superb comedy, topping anything he's ever done; the swell comedy team of Ted Healy and Patsy Kelly; Gregory Ratoff's inimitable accent; The Ritz Brothers and their Harry Richman and Ted Lewis impersonations and their operatic rendition of "The Music Goes 'Round"; and the song, "When Did You Leave Heaven?"

Preview Postscript

This marks Alice Faye's camera debut as an "amber blonde"—light brown and orange to the cynics. She polled all of the men at the studio to find out if they liked it better than her blonde locks. Some of them didn't, but Michael Whalen did, so that was that. The Faye "figger," in case you're interested, is due to ice-skating. She held the amateur championship for women in New York for five years . . . Ted Healy was married to actress Betty Hickman the day before beginning work on this film. They flew to Yuma, Arizona, for the ceremony. Which explains Ted's hard work on this picture, for according to Ted himself he was never so in earnest about work before he had the little woman to impress . . . The wisecrackingest gal on the set was Veronica Kelly—Patsy to youse.

★★★ Lady Be Careful

(Paramount)

Surprisingly enough, this has turned out to be very commendable screen fare. It's been many a movie moon since Lew Ayres has been in a worth while film, but he makes up for everything with his excellent performance here. And Mary Carlisle has developed overnight into as pleasing a comedienne as we have seen for some time. Benny Baker and Larry Crabbe turn in good performances and the rest of the cast is well selected in every instance. Taken from "Sailor, Beware," the play deals with the same gob who becomes the pride of the navy through his irresistible, though totally unsuspected, sex appeal. Sailor Ayres is the one who doesn't suspect his own charms, so when Benny Baker bets Larry Crabbe, a Marine, that Lew can have "Stonewall" Jackson (Mary Carlisle) madly in love with him in no time, the complications set in. Sinking the Japanese fleet looks simpler to our hero. The progress of the romance from then on involves a continual series of hilarious situations. You'll get your quota of laughs, sighs and everything you expect from a good movie when you see this one.

Preview Postscript

This role marked a triumphant milestone in the life of Benny Baker. It's the first time he's ever had a stooge. Having a stooge all to yourself might not seem so much to lots of people, but if, like Benny, you'd been a stooge to other people all your life you'd appreciate the change. Joe Ploski is Benny's man-of-all-work now . . . Lew Ayres started the picture looking pretty glum. Divorces in Hollywood do get some folks down, popular opinion notwithstanding. But after doing a few scenes with Mary Carlisle and playing a couple of sets of ping-pong with her between shots, Lew began to brighten. Some of their better scenes, as a result, aren't all acting . . . Wesley Barry surprised every one in the cast by announcing one day that he was celebrating his tenth wedding anniversary. It seemed to most of the company that Wes was still the freckle-faced youngster which he portrayed for so many years on the screen . . . Larry Buster Crabbe became a proud father during the picture's production. Buster was Olympic champ for the swimming events in 1932, and this is practically the first time when brawn wasn't the main requisite for his celluloid appearances.

★★★ Piccadilly Jim

(M-G-M)

Here's a load of nonsense, strictly in the high comedy department, which will more than satisfy the most particular audiences. Especially gratifying is the fact that M-G-M has, after all these years, seen fit to give Robert Montgomery a role worthy of his talents. It will make audiences forget his rather negative portrayals in "Petticoat Fever" and "Trouble for Two." In this one he's a caricaturist for a London paper and the sole support of his expensive playboy-actor father, Frank Morgan. The playboy tactics inherited from dear old dad soon lead to Montgomery's dismissal from the paper. Things look black until he clicks with a syndicated cartoon strip based on the antics of a title-seeking American family. The strip is a riot all over England and sends the originals into an embarrassed retreat to America. Much to Mr. M.'s surprise and chagrin, he discovers that the gal (Madge Evans) he loves is a daughter of the family. The story itself is unimportant, for it's the dialogue and comedy situations that make it one of the brightest offerings of the season. In addition to the excellent Montgomery and Morgan portrayals, there is superb support from Eric Blore in the role of Bob's valet, and able performances by Billie Burke, Grant Mitchell and Robert Benchley.

Preview Postscript

Robert Benchley recently broke all precedent and went to the "Troc" for an evening of gayety. After the doings he asked a man standing at the door to get him a cab. "I'm not the doorman," said the man, "I'm a naval officer." "Okay," said Benchley, "get me a boat." . . . One of the biggest sources of entertainment on the set was the smallest member in the cast—eleven-year-old Tommy Bupp. He made his screen debut two years ago in a Hal Roach-er and since that time has appeared in almost twenty-five productions. Tommy has no screen aspirations when he grows up, though. He wants to go right back to Hal Roach studios and direct all the kids . . . Eric Blore had to admit that one particular day he put in on the set wasn't too much fun. He skipped eleven miles with a rope (Blore calculations), imitated ten birds, was kicked twenty-seven times in the shins by Tommy Bupp and had to kick himself a couple dozen times in the shins . . . Immediately following the picture's completion, Bob Montgomery packed his wife, daughter and household goods and set out for that farm in Connecticut. The Montgomery's have been threatening to hibernate to this place for the last five years, but to date they have only spent a month at a time. They intend remaining six months at least, and no matter how tempting a movie offer comes up, Bob will have nothing to do with it . . . Madge Evans claims she doesn't believe in long engagements, so she must be married to Tom Gallery by this time. It's been about two years now that one hasn't been seen around Hollywood without the other. But they insist that there have been no wedding bells. Tom is Zasu Pitts' ex-husband, y'know.

★★★ A Son Comes Home
(Paramount)

Erstwhile comedienne Mary Boland turns dramatic for this. Minus her jittery partner, Charles Ruggles, she dons the mantle of the late Marie Dressler, and a very nice fit it is, too, although the hem may have to be taken up and a few tucks added. In this film, directed by Europe's competent E. A. Dupont, scenarized by Irving Thalberg's sister, Sylvia, Miss Boland is Mary

"LIBELED LADY"

Her reputation was worth $5,000,000—and she made up her mind to collect from the man who called her "husband-snatcher." But she reckoned without her heart—the heart she couldn't control! The full-length novel, based on the picture, "Libeled Lady," starring Jean Harlow, Myrna Loy, William Powell, and Spencer Tracy, appears in the November SCREEN ROMANCES.

Grady, one of those water-front "heart-of-gold" ladies who runs a chowder house. Her chief concern is her son Denny, missing for fifteen years. When he turns up as the murderer in a hold-up killing that involves an innocent youth, Mary is heroic in the traditional fashion. The greatest suspense—and the film has plenty, so you'd better see it—is the audience's awareness of Mary's ignorance that the murderer she is hunting is her long-lost son. There are several novel plot twists, but we won't spoil them for you by telling. The intellectuals' darling, Julie Haydon, not seen since "The Scoundrel," reappears in this film. Also Donald Woods, Wallace Ford, Anthony Nace (promising Broadway newcomer), Roger Imhof, Helen Flint. The latter registers in a shady-lady role. If you liked the "pixilated" females in "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town," you'll find two more like them in this film. The biggest surprise is Miss Boland, making a skillful transition from comedy to drama and winning audience sympathy with a tear, a sob, a smile.

After waiting fifteen months for some work, Julie Haydon finally got this role. After New York successes she was brought to Hollywood with considerable ballyhoo, then she was left with time on her hands. Now she has a contract with M-G-M . . . Edgar Sherrod celebrated his 746th appearance as a man of the cloth in this celluloider. He's played all the religions, even to officiating at a Holy Roller's wedding. In real life Mr. Sherrod is an Episcopalian minister, and formerly deacon of a diocese in Atlanta, Georgia. . . . Donald Woods was in a predicament. Depending on which sequence was to be shot, he had to appear for half a day in well-pressed clothes and the rest of the time in rumpled clothing, or vice versa. Pressing was easy enough, but it took an astute property man to solve the un-pressing problem. He rigged up a machine with a wringer which had corrugated iron rolls on it!

★★ The Texas Rangers

"The Texas Rangers" is a glorified horse opera, eulogizing the courage and the bravery of the hardy souls who play the title role. Directed by King Vidor, it has vigor and a certain quota of excitement, but it lacks the epic qualities for which it undoubtedly reached. Plot concerns the careers of Jack Oakie and Fred MacMurray, a pair of bandits in league with Lloyd Nolan, the toughest hombre in the West. Oakie and MacMurray join the Rangers, hoping to secure inside tips on good robbery prospects which they can pass along to Nolan. Comes a gal into the situation, one of the fairest flowers of old Texas, and she sort of makes Fred see the error of his ways. His love for her isn't strong enough, however, to make him accept an assignment to track down and kill Nolan, and he's tossed into the jug. Good old Jack Oakie goes after his man, though, and gets himself killed for his efforts. Oakie's death spurs MacMurray into action, and you know what happens then. The picture has a lot of cowboy-Indian stuff and, as in the case of most open air dramas, beautiful photography. Jack Oakie and Lloyd Nolan take acting honors—Oakie with his excellent comedy and Nolan with a thoroughly first-rate portrayal of the bad man. Fred MacMurray and Jean Parker share a mild love story, and there are other capable performances by Benny Bartlett and Edward Ellis.

The longest location trip ever sent out by Paramount was for this celluloider. Eight weeks were spent by the cast and crew in Gallup and Santa Fe, New Mexico, and adjoining small towns. Among the extras employed were 250 Navajo Indians and two Governors. Governor Allred of Texas and Governor Clyde Tingley of New Mexico. If you look closely you can see them gallop past in a couple of scenes. Governor Allred even directed the first scene. The company was located on the Indian reservation twenty miles outside of Gallup, while the Governor was in Dallas. A field wire was strung from the town to the set; Director Vidor held a megaphone to the receiver and Gov. Allred let loose with directions. The fact that Vidor had to direct the scene all over again didn't spoil the fun. Gallons of sunburn lotion had been brought along to use on the cast, but it was all used up on the Indians. They just couldn't take it, having been used to white man's garments these many years. One day in the blistering sun, clad in the breech-cloths and feathers of their forefathers, every last Injun of the 250 began blistering. . . . Albert Silva, well-known sculptor, under contract to Paramount for set decorating, was given the job of making that memorial statue of a Texas Ranger, which was sent to Dallas and will later have a permanent place in the State House at Austin, Texas. A gala banquet was thrown by the Dallas officials for the sculptor, the principals and the director who went to Dallas for the presentation.

★★ Walking on Air

(RKO-Radio)

Watching this one unroll won't be time wasted. Gene Raymond and Ann Sothern come through with some of the best comedy screened in a long time. The plot doesn't lack complications, either. Ann Sothern is determined to marry a foreign count, and the fact that her father, Henry Stephenson and a man of iron, is equally determined that she'll not marry a no-account, still has Ann rushing the wedding bells. In order to outwit him, Ann hires Gene Raymond, a jobless radio crooner, to pose as another count and make himself as thoroughly obnoxious as possible. Then after several reels of choice insults, Ann announces that she is going to marry the new count instead. But life with father hasn't taught Ann all his tricks. He heartily agrees with her plan, and the fact that Gene considers it all in the day's work puts the heroine in a spot, particularly since discovering that Gene is the Real Thing in her life. Nothing much to any of it, but a lot of laughs, provided chiefly by the leads, aided and abetted by Henry Stephenson, Jessie Ralph, George Meeker, Maxine Jennings and Anita Colby.

★ Cain and Mabel

(Warners)

The latest Marion Davies celluloider differs little from its predecessors. It's just as mediocre. In addition to the usual extravagant outlay of sets, costumes and dance numbers, however, we have Mr. Clark Gable. The only similarity in this performance and the excellent ones he's been turning in lately, are the Gable dimples. Roscoe Karns gives the most convincing characterization of the picture—another of those publicity-agent jobs. He works himself into a couple of nervous breakdowns a day trying to get "color" into the lives of his two clients, Marion Davies and Clark Gable. Marion, a former waitress, is now the toast of the town due to a musical comedy success, while Clark, a former mechanic, has taken the place by storm with his prize-fighting prowess. Roscoe succeeds in giving them so much glamor that there's standing-room-only at all performances—only to have his clients throw it all over for an organdy-curtained cottage within walking distance of Clark's garage. The plot, in case you were wondering, has to do with the deep hatred felt by Marion and Clark for each other until the last reel when it turns into love's old sweet story. A good supporting cast includes Ruth Donnelly, Allen Jenkins, Walter Catlett and Hobart Cavanaugh. A couple of dance numbers and a scene of Clark in the ring are worth seeing.

Preview Postscript

It took three and a half months to shoot this one, known as "Cain and Gable" around town. When a Davies picture gets under way, things really start. Being vice-president of your company really helps a gal in getting the background she likes. As an example, Marion had her heart set on a particularly elegant set for the "Thousand Love Songs" background. The fact that no stage at Warners or any place else in Hollywood was large enough to accommodate her ideas, didn't stop the star one minute. A hundred carpenters were rushed out to Stage 7 and set to work raising the foundation with packs so that thirty feet were added to the height of the building. Marion doesn't think only of sets, however. She takes the cast into consideration, too, to the extent of furnishing gallons of ice-cream, orange juice, etc., every afternoon to the wilting extras, and gifts galore to her supporting cast. Gold watches were dished out by the star as souvenirs. Clark and Marion had some fun with those water dousing scenes. At least Marion did. Contrary to the picture's sequence, Marion's chance to douse Clark came first in the shooting schedule. It required six takes and therefore six drenchings for Gable before Miss D. did it to the director's satisfaction. Clark swore he'd get even with her when his turn came. But he was too good—the director was satisfied with Clark's first attempt. . . . David Carlyle's been on radio for some time, but this is his first celluloid appearance. Happening to drop in on his agent one day, after three years of that gentleman's handling his business with no movie offers, the agent casually mentioned that Warners needed a singing star for this picture—and needed him that same day. They rushed out to the studio, but Dave couldn't get a test without a light suit. Owning none but the brown one he had on, Dave was up against it. Until he spotted his agent's gray one. After three years, the agent finally did Dave some good!

★★ His Brother's Wife

(M-G-M)

This film contains almost every time-worn situation that has limped across the screen in the past decade or so. First you are shown Bob Taylor as a handsome young doctor-playboy with a supposedly amusing habit of trading hats with milkmen and cab drivers. He's out on a final binge before setting off for the South Seas to do battle with a deadly insect. He meets a gambling-house gal with a heart of gold (Barbara Stanwyck) and together they romp through several days of alleged gayety, culminating when the young man decides to give up his trip in favor of marrying the gal. His brother (John Eldredge) talks him out of it at the last minute. Out of revenge, Barbara woos and wins the brother, who goes to pieces when he discovers she doesn't love him. In the meantime, Bob returns on leave, takes Barbara back with him. When she gets her divorce from his brother, Bob kicks her out—seems he likes revenge, too. But brave little Barbara injects herself with the virus of the deadly insect, gives Bob an opportunity to try out a new serum. True love and the Taylor serum win out. Best performance in the picture is Jean Hersholt's, as an elderly doctor dedicating his life to science. Biggest surprise is that the picture was directed by W. S. ("San Francisco," "Naughty Marietta," "Thin Man") Van Dyke, who probably did all he could with the material at hand.

When Barbara Stanwyck and Robert Taylor learned that the studio planned to use them both in a picture, they raised a fine rumpus. Seems they didn't care to screen any of their tenderer moments. But the studio had its way. Bob and Barbara had such a swell time together every day on the set that they are now begging for another celluloider together. Bob even bought a radio-victrola which remained on the set all the time, so's Barbara could listen to her favorite recordings and programs . . . Jean Hersholt received some news while making this film that made him about the happiest man in Hollywood. It was word that he was to be cast in the new "Quints" celluloider now in production. Mr. Hersholt is eager to get back to the girl friends, and also to resume his pleasant friendship with the good doctor whom he portrays on the screen.

★★★ Hollywood Boulevard

(Paramount)

This is the story of a forgotten screen star. It's cruel, but it presents a fairly accurate picture of what happens to an actor whose public has passed him by. It's a story that has been lived by dozens of one-time screen idols who today are glad to get "bit" and even "extra" roles in current productions. Conclusive proof of this point is that several of them are doing that very thing in "Hollywood Boulevard." If you look closely, you'll see people like Charles Ray, Francis X. Bushman, Jack Mulhall, Betty Compson, Mae Marsh, Frank Mayo, William Desmond, Maurice Costello and Bryant Washburn. The plot evolves about John Halliday, an actor whose Hollywood star has fallen. In order to bolster his dwindling finances, he allows his memoirs—highly seasoned by ghost writers—to be published in a confession magazine. The notoriety he attains doesn't bother him until he sees its result on his daughter, Marsha Hunt. The "diary" also panics the wife of the confession magazine's publisher, for she at one time had romantic adventures with the actor. The story is not particularly important, but the picture will interest movie-goers because of the deft performance of John Halliday, the believable romance of Marsha Hunt and Robert Cummings, and mainly, perhaps, because it gives fans a peek into a number of Hollywood's most publicized spots.

Preview Postscript

"Hail, hail, the gang's all here" might have been the subtitle of this film. Salaries for this celluloider would have run close to the three million mark had it been made in the palmier days of its actors and actresses. Charles Ray, alone, would have made a neat dent in that three million. Now he's glad to get an extra role and in between times coaches young hopefuls for a screen career. He's tried writing, running a florist shop, and odds and ends of jobs since his movie demise . . . Maurice Costello was quite miffed when Director Robert Florey called him up to appear in this picture. Mr. Florey, diplomatically, so he thought, asked Costello if he would break his retirement and appear in the film. "I haven't been in retirement," shouted the actor. "I just haven't had any work since 1927. Furthermore, I don't appreciate the gag." When he learned it was all in earnest, Mr. Costello appeared promptly on the set. . . . Jack Mulhall gets huge enjoyment out of meeting visitors on the set. They always express pleasure that he's making a comeback. The truth is that Jack's never been out of pictures. If you watch your movies carefully you'll see Jack in many a "bit" role, which has been his job since he lost out on those leading roles. What's more, he makes a neat income from it. Jack started in films back in 1908—and Paul Kelly was in his first picture. We hasten to add, however, that Paul could hardly walk at the time . . . If you remember "Birth of a Nation," you remember Mae Marsh. She was the gal who did the dive from the cliff. Between quite frequent roles in pictures, Mae lives in Pasadena, where she is the wife of a writer and mother of three children . . . Betty Compson's last celluloid appearance was in 1933 when she made a picture for one of the independents. She started way back in the "Miracle Man"—remember? She's Mrs. Irving Weinberg of Beverly Hills in private life . . . Herbert Rawlinson is one of the old-timers who is still working in minor roles. He was that handsome guy who brought the ladies back to the movie houses week after week when he appeared in those men-of-iron, heart-of-gold numbers. Thinks movies are sissy now. He was laid up in the hospital for three weeks during his first picture back in 1917 because of a few broken ribs and collarbones sustained during a wild ride after a celluloid villain.

★★ Yours for the Asking

(Paramount)

George Raft gets a role at last that's right down his alley. And when Mr. Raft comes across something like this he knows what to do about it. Here he plays a gambler de luxe, perfect in detail from patent leather slippers to patent leather pompadour, with plenty of brain-power. Emotions never get the upper hand with George, even when he meets Dolores Costello Barrymore, a sassiety girl down to her last yacht. He proposes fast enough—but it's a business proposition involving a partnership for them in a gambling establishment to be housed in the Miami mansion belonging to Dolores and the mortgage company. It looks like the perfect set-up until Mr. Raft's pals, James Gleason, Edgar Kennedy and Lynne Overman, get wind of the fact that their boss is going society. Ida Lupino and Reginald Owen, two of the classiest crooks ever seen, are enlisted to help the well-meaning meanies. James Gleason and his two side-kicks give excellent performances. Dolores Costello's dignified beauty has a nice setting, but feminine acting honors go to Ida Lupino. If it's laughs, excitement and a touch of sophistication you like, you won't go wrong on this picture.

Look carefully and you'll spot Groucho Marx and Charlie Ruggles among the extras in this picture. Groucho and Charlie, furthermore, turned out to be the cheapest extra help that Paramount's ever had. In fact they worked gratis. Both were vacationing down at Coronado Beach, trying to get away from it all—meaning anything to do with movies. While on the beach one afternoon, they were surprised to see a van arrive, loaded with film equipment. It was too much to resist, so the boys offered to play bits if the director would let them, just for the fun of it . . . Director Alexander Hall entertained the entire cast several times during production at his new ranch out in the San Fernando Valley. Hall, incidentally, isn't dependent on the movies for a living, by any means. He bought the ranch with one object in mind—to make a living. And he's going to do it by turkeys, of all things. Mr. Hall knew absolutely nothing about raising anything, let alone turkeys. But they appealed to his fancy so he stocked the place with them, and learned all about raising them. What's more, he's actually made money on them . . . The girl who played the $7,500,000 heiress in this celluloider was an extra earning $7.50 per day. "Dress extras"—those with complete wardrobes—receive between ten and fifteen dollars per day. Extras who can speak a line—whether it be one word or seventy—get a minimum of $25.

★★ China Clipper
(First National)

A giant airliner is the star of "China Clipper." It is perhaps true that an airplane has no sex appeal, but it usually has something which registers quite definitely at the box-office. In this case, the scenes showing the flight of the China Clipper are the most exciting in the film. There's a thrill every moment the camera is focused on the great ship. As for the story behind all this, it's one of those standardized things. It has Pat O'Brien, the most intrepid of all screen aviators, with the possible exception of Jimmy Cagney, as a great-hearted but hard-boiled executive of an air line. His ruthless tactics, spurred on by his belief in the future of aviation, drive his men on to newer and greater achievements and drive his wife (Beverly Roberts) back to mother. But Pat wins out, and all hands agree that the China Clipper, inspired by him, is a step forward. Pat O'Brien is his usual brusque self as the tough executive. Beverly Roberts seems miscast as the wife. Humphrey Bogart and Ross Alexander are excellent as a pair of aviators, and Marie Wilson contributes comedy as a gal with a yen for Mr. Alexander.

Beverly Roberts is sick and tired of being known as "that wholesome looking girl." She wants, above all, to play the slinky siren and never see one of those little-girls-from-back-home roles again. But it looks like a losing fight, for Beverly's spent her entire life cooped up in night clubs and stuffy apartments, in New York theatres and cabarets of London and Paris, and no matter how late she wakes up, or how many cigarettes she consumes, Beverly always wakes up looking wholesome. Beverly, incidentally, began her screen career as a member of the S.P.A.S.A.T.A.U. In case you're interested, that's the Screen Players' Atmospheric Stenographer and Telephone Answerer Union. Every member of this organization started her career on the screen either as an atmospheric but speechless stenographer in some scene or a telephone answerer in some other. She was formerly a night club singer . . . Alarm clocks and movies don't get along so well. Marie Wilson had the clever idea of carrying one in her handbag. This was set for half-hour intervals, so if Marie wanted to curl up in her car between shots for a nap she could always get back to the set on time. But she had to give it up finally, due to the fact that she would forget about her timepiece when returning to the set. It went off in the middle of too many scenes.

★ Two in a Crowd

(Universal)

You will probably forget what this is all about by the time you leave the theatre, but you may remember that it was pleasantly diverting fare. Joel McCrea and Joan Bennett furnish the romantic interest. They treat life and love in the light-hearted fashion currently in vogue. Even when both are flat broke on New Year's Eve they are looking forward with undiminished ardor to the New Year. And they aren't disappointed. Each finds a half of a thousand dollar bill, which brings about their meeting. They pool their assets and back Joel's horse for the handicap race. The infectious gayety of Joel and Joan is naturally felt by the horse as well as the audience, so he romps across the line in the nick of time. It's all too breezy to carry much conviction, but Joel McCrea's efforts are responsible for a few really good scenes, and Joan Bennett's blonde prettiness doesn't hamper matters. Others in the cast who do well with what the script allows are Alison Skipworth, Henry Armetta, Reginald Denny and Donald Meek.

Every year banks are closed and millions of flags fly on Henry Armetta's birthday, for the popular comedian was born on the Fourth of July. But he didn't realize the significance of the date until he came to America from his native Italy as a boy. Having such a patriotic birth date didn't influence the deportation authorities, who would have shipped Henry straight home again had not a chance acquaintance agreed to give him a steady job in his barber shop . . . Few actors have had such varied experiences as Nat Pendleton, since his earlier activities included four years as an importer in Spain and Portugal, the formation of True Story Films Corporation, which he managed, and later he turned professional wrestler, engaging in bouts all over the country . . . Though Joan Bennett lived in Hollywood for a couple of years, she never put foot into a movie studio, and didn't want to. Married at 15, Joan was all wrapped up in domesticity, her husband and baby. But a divorce followed, and on the heels of it Joan delighted her father by announcing that she would accept a role in "Jarnegan," the play which Bennett, Sr., was just going to open in on Broadway. After that success, Joan found herself back in Hollywood . . . Ten years in leading roles for Mack Sennett comedies was the fate of Andy Clyde. And he still likes custard pies. Andy was born in Blairgowrie, Scotland, in 1889, and appeared on the English stage for several years before giving Hollywood a try.

★ Follow Your Heart

(Republic)

This is one of those pictures worth seeing just to hear. But that, unfortunately, is its only justification. Marion Talley seems very ill at ease in her screen debut, except when singing, and her speaking voice surprisingly enough is one of her weaker points. The final sequences which concern a show put on in front of a Southern mansion has some interesting features. Notably the songs by Miss Talley and Michael Bartlett, the beautiful selections by the Hall Johnson choristers and a ballet number, "Magnolias in the Moonlight." Others in the cast are Nigel Bruce, Luis Alberni, Margaret Irving, Vivienne Osborne, Henrietta Crosman and Walter Catlett. The picture is strung together rather haphazardly on the doings of a temperamental family of the old South, who have been stage struck for generations. The only one to escape the curse is daughter Marion Talley, who in spite of her family's insistence prefers to stay at home. Then Michael Bartlett comes along with a travelling troupe, love comes into Marion's life and after a series of long drawn-out complications, she breaks down and promises to love, honor and go on the road. Mr. Bartlett is not our idea of romance, being pretty self-conscious about it all. But you will excuse the heroine and hero when they break into song.

The Best GRAY HAIR REMEDY IS MADE AT HOME

YOU can now make at home a better gray hair remedy than you can buy, by following this simple recipe: To half pint of water add one ounce bay rum, a small box of Barbo Compound and one-fourth ounce of glycerine. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it yourself at very little cost. Apply to the hair twice a week until the desired shade is obtained. Barbo imparts color to streaked, faded or gray hair, makes it soft and glossy and takes years off your looks. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy and does not rub off. Do not be handicapped by gray hair now when it is so economical and easy to get rid of it in your own home.

years of training and a Metropolitan debut at nineteen, Marion retired to the Kansas cornfields. Happiness and fame, she still contends, have nothing to do with each other . . . Seldom before have so many celebrated singers been assembled in a screen production. Supporting Marion Talley and Michael Bartlett, tenor of concert and opera stage, are thirteen players whose names have been featured in singing roles. In addition to these are fifty negro choristers, members of the famous Hall Johnson choir of New York, and Larry Ceballos, dancing-singing ensemble of 100. Cenarro Curci, brother of Galli Curci, was among the warblers, and also Aubrey Scotto, the director, who used to be a singer of note in opera, would join in with the cast whenever possible. Three of the songs were created by Victor Schertzinger . . . For voice range, members of the Hall Johnson chorus claim the world's record. Three of the women sopranos sing in E above high C. Three of the basses take A below lowest C. Ten altos have voices ranging from mezzo-soprano to baritone. The chorus came to Hollywood after four years in "The Green Pastures" on the stage . . . The San Francisco earthquake caused Walter Catlett to leave immediately for New York and stay 25 years. Besides acting, Catlett's interests are torn betwen writing, directing, drawing, painting and collecting books on early American history.

—★ Postal Inspector

(Universal)

This looks for all the world like a newsreel gone wrong. It starts out by giving us the lowdown on the postal system, complete with shots of thousands of letters being shuffled around and thousands of postmen shuffling around, too. Then Ricardo Cortez shows up as a Postal Inspector and on a plane trip he gets the opportunity to inspect Patricia Ellis. For some unknown reason he won't okay Pat, even when it develops that his kid brother, Michael Loring, is planning to make her Ricardo's sister-in-law. But to get on with the newsreel; there's a flood and three million dollars of the post-office money is lost in it. Michael Loring is suspected, so is Pat, so is Bela Lugosi, owner of a night club where Pat works. We'll let you guess who did away with the dough. Ricardo Cortez gives his usual suave performance. Patricia Ellis doesn't have much of a chance to do anything but look pretty, which she manages a lot better than a couple of songs. Michael Loring is adequate.

John Halliday and Marsha Hunt in a scene from "Hollywood Boulevard." You'll see many old-time favorites in this picture, too.

This Old Treatment Often Brings Happy Relief Of Pain

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are one of Nature's chief ways of taking the acids and waste out of the blood. If they don't pass 3 pints a day and so get rid of more than 3 pounds of waste matter, your 15 miles of kidney tubes may need flushing.

If you have trouble with frequent bladder passages with scanty amount which often smart and burn, the 15 miles of kidney tubes may need flushing out. This danger signal may be the beginning of nagging backache, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes and dizziness.

Don't wait for serious trouble. Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills — used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help flush out the 15 miles of kidney tubes. Get Doan's Pills.

In a scene where he was wading around up to his knees in water, Ric Cortez wore high rubber boots to insure comfort as well as the proper effect for the audience. Suddenly a chilling sensation appraised him of the fact that one boot had sprung a leak and before he could say "cinematographer" it was filled with icy water. Ricardo just took off both boots after that and waded right in. Cortez has been in pictures for the past fourteen years and is always threatening that each picture will be his swan song. He began his career as an extra in a New Jersey film company. Three guesses where Cortez was born—it wasn't Spain, Mexico or any place that you might bet on. He's a native of Vienna, Austria . . . Hollywood Playgirl Number One is Patricia Ellis' unofficial title. If there's a party going on among Hollywood's young set, it's a pretty sure thing that Pat either thought it up or is keeping it going. Tennis, badminton, swimming, fencing, riding, dancing—any sport you might mention—are right up the Ellis alley. . . . Though Michael Loring started out to be a doctor at the University of Minnesota, after five years he found that the play's the thing. So he joined the Repertory Theatre in Minneapolis, but not for very long. Then Mike decided to capitalize on his baritone voice. An engagement at Hollywood's Trocadero resulted in a movie contract.

—★ Satan Met a Lady

(Warners)

Bette Davis takes plenty of punishment in this one. Of all the roles that the studio has picked for Miss Davis, this is the prize lemon. She has the role of a coy murderess, caught in the web of life. Had her murderous instincts been aroused by Warren William, the plot would have been justified in our eyes. But as it is, she falls for Warren and he reciprocates by arranging a life sentence for her and wedding bells for himself and Marie Wilson. Mr. W. plays a crooked detective, for whom the ladies swoon all over the set. Marie Wilson is sleuth William's very private detective and gets a few bona fide laughs into the picture, while Alison Skipworth and Arthur Treacher, as a couple of crooks, try to make their roles convincing, but the cards are stacked against them. The plot concerns the hunt for an antique horn, filled with precious jewels and—and so we don't know why we're telling you all this because it isn't worth seeing anyway.

When Bette Davis, in the parlance of the movies gives, she gives. In one scene for this picture the action required her, after an exchange of torrid words with Warren William, to storm out of the room, closing the door behind her. The scene lacked punch, so Director Dieterle told Bette to try slamming the door. Once more the cameras whirred. Bette rushed through the door and slammed it with a bang that jarred everyone's eardrums. The cast and crew looked amazed at what had been the door. The portal had split directly down the middle and sagged on lock and hinges. That's the kind of acting Miss Davis likes to do . . . One of the unique arrangements on a Dieterle set is that the stand-ins must learn the lines of the stars. The life of a stand-in is a far cry from that of the stage understudy, for they never take the role of the star in any emergency. But Dieterle acts on the theory that every individual is a potential star, and thus gives every stand-in the chance to prove it . . . Whenever Warren William is on the set you'll find a full-length mirror there, too. Before every appearance for the camera, Warren runs to the mirror and goes through all his lines and actions needed for the shot. It's a habit that Warren's had since his first days in films—more years ago than you'd think. Warren used to play in those thrilling serials "way back when." He appeared opposite Pearl White when she was one of the screen's brightest stars, earning the then magnificent salary of $100 a week. That was Pearl's money—Warren pulled down $25 . . . Marie Wilson gambled against Hollywood and won. Convinced of her ability, she risked all her material possessions for a one-year campaign in the cinema capital. The first step was a mink coat, and on the strength of that she won a role in a little theatre production. They didn't need Marie, but they needed a mink coat. A Warner Bros. sleuth spotted her and Marie signed on the dotted line.

Incidentally, Freddie Bartholomew is picking up some first-class pointers on American slang from Mickey Rooney and Jackie Cooper, who co-star with him in the picture. He's getting now so he can get off, "Oh, yeah?" and "Scram!" with barely a trace of the Thames in them. They're even saying he's out for gangster roles from now on. It's all a bit of a shock, you know.

Fans of Anne Shirley might be interested to know that her heart interests have narrowed down to one young man. Seen around with various Hollywood gentlemen, she had been asked who was Number One in the race. Number One, she stated, was not a Hollywood lad, but someone from the east. The other night at a preview she appeared with Owen Davis, Jr., who had just returned from Connecticut stock company engagements. Pointing to young Mr. Davis, Anne announced, "This is it." So that is that, we suppose.

And now that the "Anthony Adverse" premiere has come and gone, it can probably be said that it was a more "terrific" opening than "The Great Ziegfeld." Mainly, of course, because the Warner Brothers erected grandstands along the entrance to the Carthay Circle Theatre so people could look at people who came to look at Mr. Adverse. Everybody looked at everybody else, and five women fainted. Not, unfortunately, because they saw Gene Raymond, but because it was so crowded they couldn't breathe.

Here's a problem, if you like problems. Jimmy Stewart, one day recently, sat on his porch watching a new next-door neighbor move in. The neighbor, to his surprise, turned out to be Garbo. Next day a high board fence was under construction between the two estates. Question: Who put up the fence—Garbo or Stewart? Your guess is as good as ours!

Faster footwork is hard to find than that of the agile Eleanor Powell. In "Born to Dance" you will see her in some intricate and exciting dances.

The "knock, knock" game is riding the crest in Hollywood these days. One of the worst ones was Jack Oakie's, told on the set of "The Texas Rangers." Well, here it is: "Knock, knock." "Who's there?" "Texas." "Texas who?" "Texas sap to think of these." But Fred MacMurray's was better: "Knock, knock." "Who's there?" "Jack Oakie." "There's nobody home!"

Epics come and epics likewise go, but the most colossal of them all should be "Tarzan Escapes." Not that it is Garbo in the cast or anything like that, but because it's been in production since June, 1935, and it's still going. Seems after a hard six months work the picture was completed. It had everything, people said. Everything but a story. So a new director took over and the curtain once more falls to denote a lapse of six months. Now "Tarzan Escapes" had a story, but nothing else. A third director is now at work, and he promises to get the boys out of the jungles by Christmas. There are stories around that men go mad out there on the M-G-M back lot jungle. Men go into those trackless wilds never to return, unless they escape over the back fence, which is the route probably taken by the first two directors.

The whole business is a fine thing for Johnny Weissmuller, though. He's under contract for duration of the picture, and it's beginning to look like a permanent job. So, time marches on and Johnny swings merrily from the treetops, growling his guttural jibes at civilization at $1,000 a week.

Surprise party on the "Libeled Lady" set one day recently which really was a surprise party. When Myrna Loy and Bill Powell walked onto the set, after lunch, the lights went out and they found themselves surrounded by Jean Harlow, Spencer Tracy, Walter Connolly and the rest of the cast. When the lights went up there was a huge birthday cake with a discreet number of candles and an inscription: "Happy Birthday to Mrs. Horntoot." Mrs. Horntoot, of course, is the glamorous Mrs. Hornblow, nee Myrna Loy.

The most versatile actor in Hollywood is probably Pat O'Brien. When Mrs. O'Brien journeyed to New York recently to purchase clothes for her dress shop, Pat took over the care and feeding of the O'Brien offspring, Mavourneen. His day at the studio, where he portrayed a hard-boiled cop, was broken up by phone calls to the O'Brien manse to carry on conversations with the nurse in which sun baths and strained spinach were the main topics. Mrs. O'Brien returned to find Mavourneen alive and healthy and Pat all set for a rest cure.

Short Story: Arline Judge likes to meet people. So when she moved into her dressing-room at Paramount she had "Jack Oakie" lettered on the door.

Here's how some Hollywood stars diet. The other night in a local cafe, Gladys Swarthout and her husband, Frank Chapman, ordered Corn Flakes. "No Corn Flakes," said the waitress. "Shredded Wheat," said Gladys. "No Shredded Wheat," said the waitress. "Well," said Gladys with what didn't sound like much of a sigh, "you'd better give us two T-bone steaks."

Title change of the month is the handle on Mae West's forthcoming picture. Mae has just finished a screen version of "Personal Appearance," the stage comedy success. But they're afraid to keep the title for fear people will think the glamorous Miss W. is honoring them with just that. So now it's "Go West, Young Man." How about "Mae Time"?

Bette Davis has taken her own private war with Warner Brothers and sailed off to Europe with it. It'll probably feel more at home there, at that. In the meantime, George Brent, at least, seems reconciled to her walkout on "God's Country and the Woman." When the company returned from its Washington location trip George flew his plane back to Hollywood—and the only passenger was his new leading lady, Beverly Roberts.

Bing Crosby, incidentally, is the hardest working guy on the "Pennies from Heaven" set. He's on time at the studio every morning and he's on hand for every scene. It may be because he's so fond of his Art and it may be because he owns a large share of the picture.

It's interesting, sometimes, to listen to what the stars have to say over the microphones when they're collared in the lobby on premiere night. Most of them, before they see the picture, announce to the world that they're sure it's going to be exciting and wonderful and, perhaps, even good, inwardly hoping that Mr. So-and-So, who produced it, will keep them in mind for his next super-super. Best of all the cracks, among all the laudatory gushings at the "Anthony Adverse" premiere was Fred Keating's. Mr. K. said: "I read 'Anthony Adverse'—and I congratulate myself."

Barrymore Anecdote: John Barrymore strode up to a theatre box-office the other preview night, eyed the blonde captive within, and said, "Mr. Barrymore's tickets, please." The gal blushed, as blondes occasionally do, and replied, "I'm sorry, Mr. Barrymore, there are no tickets for you." "Well," said John philosophically, digging into his pocket, "there's no harm in asking."

Bing Crosby is still wondering why they dressed him in a silk shirt for that horseback scene in "Rhythm on the Range." At least he was still wondering a few weeks ago at a luncheon on the set of "Pennies from Heaven," his next picture. The silk shirt drew many snickers from preview audiences and proved a bit embarrassing to Mr. C. So there'll be no silk shirts in "Pennies from Heaven." Instead there'll be smooth music from Bing and the other variety from Louis Armstrong, dusky master of the trumpet. And just to prove it, following the set luncheon Crosby and Armstrong entertained the assemblage with an impromptu musicale, featuring songs from the picture and such contemporary trumpet concertos as "Dinah" and "I'm Confessin'."

An on-the-set shot of William Powell and Myrna Loy. Yes, you'll see them together again in "Libeled Lady." Some others in this "big name" cast are Jean Harlow and Spencer Tracy.
